"One of the public buildings of the county, is located in this town, the county poor house, on Military Lot No. 16. The principal portion of the poor house farm (100 acres from the Silvers farm), is located in Fayette and 26 1/2 acres upon Military Lot No. 7, contiguous thereto in Seneca Falls; 101 1/5 acres of the entire farm were purchased pursuant to a resolution of the board of supervisors adopted at a meeting held Jan. 12, 1830, at which an expenditure of $3,500 was authorized for the purchase of a farm and fitting up buildings thereon, for a county poor house. A board of five superintendents of the poor was then also appointed..." This is followed by an extract of a report from the board, which includes the financial cost to run the house and farm, which "Admitted 56 paupers since April 1, 1830." (67)

"Oct. 1, 1830, fifteen paupers remained in the poor house. Twenty-five acres of land were added to the farm in 1832, at a cost of $750.00." (68)

Nature of Source: Dick's Mental Illumination and Moral Improvement was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by Isaiah Mattison in 1844. This text was the result of 26 years worth of contemplation over how to improve the elementary and secondary education of youth. Dick describes methods, programs and courses of instruction to insure that youth grow up to be intelligent Christian beings. Dick was an advocate for universal education and for moral and religious instruction within the educational system.
Comment: For Dick, the Millennium will not arrive until the earth's inhabitants have been educated according to his outline. For Dick, "salvation through knowledge" means that the awaited day of the Millennium will not come unless mankind makes definite improvements in the amount of knowledge that it can master.

Researcher: Derek Jensen
Excerpt (pages):
"Intellectual and religious education, universally extended, in combination with every other Christian exertion, would be more efficient than any other arrangement hitherto made for hastening the approach of the Millennium." (346)

"What, then are those means by which the moral world may be renewed 'in knowledge and holiness, after the image of Him who created it?' Undoubtedly the efficient training of the young from the earliest period of infancy to the age of manhood. is one of the first and most important steps to the thorough renovation of the world - a subject which has hitherto been egregiously trifled with, and overlooked, in our Christian arrangements." (347)

"Is it inquired, when we may expect the Millennium to commence? I reply, just when we please. Are we willing that it should commence in the present age? We have the means in our power, if we choose to apply them. In the course of forty years from this date the Millennium might not only be commenced, but in a rapid progress towards the summit of its glory, - provided we are willing at this moment to concentrate all our moral and intellectual energies, and to devote all our superfluous wealth, or at least a tenth part of it, to the furtherance of this object. Nay, in the course of half that period, we should have a generation rising up in knowledge and holiness, far superior to any race which has appeared in the world during the ages that are past." (348-349)
Nature of Source: Grunder reports that an advertisement for a proposed series of lectures by Wines on the ancient Hebrew form of government appeared in the New York Weekly Tribune on October 11, 1845. In the preface to Commentaries, which came as the result of his lectures, Wines claimed that he began giving lectures on the subject in 1843 when he was asked to appear before the Mercantile Library Company of Philadelphia. At such a late date, it is highly unlikely that any of Wines' work could have influenced the thought of Joseph Smith. Nevertheless, Wines provides some interesting ideas about Hebrew government as established by Moses.

Comment: The reason why Grunder thinks that Wines lectures were interesting is because the Hebraic form of government as outlined by Wines shared parallels with Book of Mormon political structures. In general, his lectures do not reflect significantly either the reign of kings or the reign of judges as represented in the Book of Mormon. Chapter 8 "The Hebrew Priesthood" talks about the role of the tribe of Levi as judges, ministers, teachers, etc. and some parallels could be drawn with information collected in that chapter, but I will not do that here. Chapter 9 "The Hebrew Prophets" is more interesting and suggests the role of prophets as being both spiritual and political. I have extracted passages below that are representative of the entire chapter.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages):
"...the duties of the prophets were not wholly religious. Their relation to the civil state was not, indeed, fixed by any constitutional provision, or legal enactment. They did not form a component part of the political system. They were not a branch of the machinery of government. Yet their authority and influence in affairs of state was by no means inconsiderable. They were, so to speak, the privileged state-moralists, guardians, and popular orators of the republic." (623)

"Two tests only of the truth or falsity of the claim to prophetical inspiration are here recognized, viz. first, whether the prophet spake in the name of Jehovah or of false gods; and, secondly, whether or not a future event, foretold by him, happened according to his word. Miracles could not be demanded of him in proof of a divine commission to speak in the name of Jehovah. The power of working wonders did not inhere in his official designation." (627)
"Upon the whole, there can be no doubt, that the prophetical office was designed to be a great and influential element in the Hebrew government. The seventy elders, chosen as assistants to Moses in the valley of Paran, were divinely inspired men, and spake to the people under the influence of the Holy Spirit. From the very foundation of the state, teachers supernaturally enlightened were appointed to instruct the people in religion, virtue, and law; and, in the darkest periods of the Hebrew history, God left not himself without inspired witnesses to the truth. At length there appeared what have been called schools of the prophets, that is, companies of young men, taught and disciplined under the direction of Samuel and other aged prophets, who succeeded him." Nature of Source: Grunder reports that an advertisement for a proposed series of lectures by Wines on the ancient Hebrew form of government appeared in the New York Weekly Tribune on October 11, 1845. In the preface to Commentaries, which came as the result of his lectures, Wines claimed that he began giving lectures on the subject in 1843 when he was asked to appear before the Mercantile Library Company of Philadelphia. At such a late date, it is highly unlikely that any of Wines' work could have influenced the thought of Joseph Smith. Nevertheless, Wines provides some interesting ideas about Hebrew government as established by Moses.

Comment: In an introductory essay to his work titled, "Introductory Essay on Civil Society and Government," Wines discusses at length both the divine and human origins of government. Near the end of his essay, he again reiterates that "Civil government is a divine institution." In several places he also refers to the status of the constitution (see D&C 98:5, 101:77 for comparison). In general, Wines' book resonates with D&C 134:1, "We believe that governments were instituted of God for the benefit of man."

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): "Civil government is a divine institution. In favor of this view we have the concurrent testimony of reason, revelation, and the wisest human authority. The testimony of reason we have in the original aptitude of our nature for government; in the possession by man of conscience, benevolence, desire of esteem, and love of society, qualities clearly suited to promote the good of civil communities, and therefore a plain indication that it is the Creator's will that such communities should exist; in the admirable order and harmony of the material universe, evincing, analogically, that it is not the design of the Deity to abandon the moral world to chance and confusion; in the fact that, were such indeed the divine purpose, our highest faculties—reason, reflection, prudence, conscience, the power of suspending our judgement, and liberty of choice—would be in vain, and caprice and passion would become the governors of human conduct; in the undoubted truth, that God's end in creating man—the perfection of his nature and the happiness of his being—would be defeated by the non-existence of civil government and law; in the actual condition and history of civil society, which is such as to lead the mind directly to the contemplation of God as its author; and in the actual benefits flowing, as it were, in a full and perpetual stream, from civil polity and law." Comment: In several passages throughout his text, Dick outlines the purposes for knowledge. The knowledge we gain in this life will be taken with us into the next. Dick does not necessarily say that we must have knowledge in order to be saved. But in order to enjoy ourselves for eternities, we must have gained a sufficient amount of knowledge in this life in order to participate in the celestial sociability of the next life. I have extracted representative passages below.
Researcher: Derek Jensen
Excerpt (pages):
"The ultimate object of all scholastic instruction ought undoubtedly to be, to convey to youthful minds substantial knowledge,...and to prepare them for the nobler employments of an immortal existence." (23)
"The education of human beings, considered in its most extensive sense, comprehends every thing which is requisite to the cultivation and improvement of the faculties bestowed upon them by the Creator. ...to direct the moral powers in such a manner as to render those who are the subjects of instruction happy in themselves, useful members of society, and qualified for entering on the scenes and employments of a future and more glorious existence." (69)
Concerning the reasons why we should learn astronomy, Dick wrote, "In short, it prepares the mind for the employments of the future world, and demonstrates, that the Creator has it in his power to distribute endlessly diversified streams of felicity, among every order of his intelligent offspring, throughout all the revolutions of eternity." Nature of Source: The Grunder List reports that this book was "Written by one very close to the events regarding William Morgan, the author of Illustrations of Masonry, who was killed following the publication of his exposé. Weed was a famous anti-Mason and was approached by Joseph Smith and Martin Harris to print the Book of Mormon but declined, despite its bias against secret combinations."

Comment: In the text Weed explains what happened to Morgan and how he died at the hands of Masons. At the end, he lists several names of those with whom he was associated at the time of Morgan's abduction- assumably anti-Masons. I extracted those names which seem to have some possible bearing on Mormon history during Joseph's time.

Excerpt (pages): Weed recalls:

"I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the 'Anti-masonic excitement' by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of 'secret societies.' We labored under serious disadvantages. The people were unwilling to believe that an institution so ancient, to which so many of our best and most distinguished men belonged, was capable of not only violating the laws but of sustaining and protecting offending men of the order...."

"It is pleasant also to contemplate the character of those with whom I was then associated judicially and politically...Moses Taggart, Seth M. Gates...of Genesee...Millard Fillmore...of Erie... and Lyman A. Spaulding, of Niagara;..." (14)

Nature of Source: Worcester's work is "parable" and explanation of his views against the doctrines of transubstantiation and a three-one God. He writes the "parable" under the name "Good-Intent" and appended to his parable is "A Conjectural Exposition of the Parable of the Pilgrim, for the Benefit of Humble Believers," by "Philip Melancthon," most likely another pseudonym taken from Luther's right-hand man in the 16th century.

Comment: Worcester begins his text with a "pathetic address" issued at the General Association of the Catholic Church on Sept. 19, 1537. The address was directed towards defending the doctrine of transubstantiation against individuals like John Calvin. The following is an excerpt concerning Catholic beliefs about spirit and matter taken from the address.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): "Let no man, therefore, shake your faith in this doctrine by saying, it is too mysterious to be believed. He that will believe no mystery must be a universal skeptic. For what doctrine of the Bible, or even of natural religion, is void of mystery? What a mystery is man? Who can comprehend the union of his soul and body, or how his spirit acts on matter, so that a thought of the mind can produce instant motion in his body? While these things are beyond our comprehension, we may easily acquire all the knowledge of them which is necessary for the purposes of life." (6)

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Philadelphia
Publisher: Printed for the Central University of Illinois
Date of Publication: 1838

Library Location: This book was on a microfilm that I got through Inter Library Loan.

Nature of Source: Rafinesque was the founder of the Central University of Illinois. He intended his work to be a text for his "own use and that of our students in the great University, Colleges and Institutions which are going to be established in Illinois, chiefly through my exertions and care."(4) It was basically a popular summary of the work of the Herschels and others.

Comment: Rafinesque comments on Paul's allusion to three different types of glory in our post mortal existence.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): Rafinesque had three suppositions about the "Locations of Futurity."
"First Supposition. Perhaps the Sun is the Paradise of all our Planets and Moons, it has equanimity of heat and light, a glorious atmosphere, luminous clouds, and a huge solid body. St. Paul says there are 3 kinds of Beings, Epuranioi Celestial, Epigeioi Terrestrial, Cataxnonioi subterrenian [sic]. We may enjoy felicity somewhere in the millions of solar Stars, or glorious Heavens now displayed by Astronomy, we may ramble or find a location into this visible Universe, seat of the actual material creation. The fiery bowels of the Earth has been deemed the Hades of wicked Souls; but there are many fiery orbs where they may spend apart their future wretched existence: rather for awhile however than forever, as the infinite Divine Mercy can scarcely doom to eternal perdition none but the most obdurate." (106-107)

"Second Supposition. Sites of future lives may be seated in the ethereal invisible worlds not seen by us, because not shedding [sic] nor reflecting light. ...Nay it may happen that there is another Universe interposed with ours, a spiritual and moral world coexistent in the same space, with relative or unconnected actions, a sentient rational economy of invisible moral worlds." (108) "Third Supposition. These two economies may even after a long while give way to another. The Bible teaches Heaven and Earth shall perish, new Heavens and a new Earth shall be created." (110)

Comment: Within the text, there are several arguments against a three-one God. The clearest of these is in the following excerpt from "Extracts from Melancthon's notes on the 'Address on the Trinity'," written in response to an address given by the General Association of New Hampshire.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): "There are some who believe, and teach, that "the only true God" is the "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" that Jesus Christ is God's own Son; and that the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the Holy ONE of Israel; which he gave to his Son not by measure; which he poured out abundantly on the Apostles; and by which he renews, sanctifies, and saves sinners. These, it is supposed, are the sentiments which occasioned the "Address of the General Association," and which are termed "damnable heresies." Yet the very texts which they have quoted, and referred to, in support of their "three-one" doctrine, contain direct proof of the sentiments they have so reproachfully denominated. Shall, then, private Christians be pleased with hearing those implicitly denounced as heretics, who prefer the simple language of God, of his Son, and of the apostles, to the mysterious, unintelligible, "three-one" language, which originated in ungodly contention, and which has so obscured the glory of Christ and the blessed truths of the gospel?" Comment: Wines outlines the patriarchal nature of Mosaic Law. While his work may be considered a rich source of material for thought on the Law of the ancient Hebrews, it is very clear that Wines own political agenda colored the way he represented the Hebraic Law. Between the sections I have excerpted below about the status of women under Mosaic Law, Wines wrote, "The spirit of the Mosaic law is opposed to the modern radicalism of woman's rights; a radicalism, which boldly avows its purpose of 'subverting the existing order of society and dissolving the existing social compact.'" Below, I have extracted passages that are in some ways similar to LDS thought about the role of women.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): "The husband and wife are regarded by the Mosaic law as one person, having, as it were, but one soul, one interest, one will. Doubtless the doctrine, that the man is the head of the woman, and that the property of the latter becomes, as a result of the nuptial tie, part and parcel of that of the former, is sometimes productive of much hardship and suffering; but who, that reflects on the frailities and passions of human nature, can doubt, that the contrary doctrine, adopted and applied as a practical principle of legislation, would be attended with evils far greater, both in number and magnitude?" (434)

After talking about the "man's mission" Wines wrote: "Woman's mission, while it has no less of dignity, is very different from this. It is to be the light and joy of the household, to nourish and train the immortal children within its precincts, to mould the whole mass of mind while in its most plastic state, to fill the throne of the heart, to be the priestess in the sanctuary of home, to be the comfort and support of man in seasons of sorrow and of suffering, to move in the realm of ignorance and want, to shine, to cheer, and to bless in all the varied ministrations of sympathy and love, from the cradle to the grave. What purer, nobler, holier realm can she desire?" (434-435)

Nevertheless, Wines provides some interesting ideas about Hebrew government as established by Moses.

Comment: Wines wrote some interesting ideas about how the Hebrews received revelation in the Temple and the status of the Urim and Thummim in the process. He goes on to write about what the Urim and Thummim were and how they were used. All of these comments come from Chapter 7 titled "The Hebrew Oracle."

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages):

"The opinion of learned and judicious authors, as to the manner of taking the sense of the oracle, is this: The high priest clothed in his pontifical garments, and having on the breastplate of judgment, in which were the mysterious urim and thummim, symbolical of the clearness and fulness of the oracular responses, presented himself before the veil of the tabernacle, over against the mercy seat, -the immediate residence of the Divine presence. The magistrate, who came to consult the oracle, stood directly behind him, and propounded the question, which was repeated by the priest. The answer was returned in an audible voice, in terms explicit, direct, and unambiguous. This explains the reason why the holy of holies, where the mercy seat stood, is so often called the oracle. It was because from thence, God returned answers to those, who came to ask counsel of him, on behalf of the public conscience, or the public administration.

"That the responses were returned in an articulate voice, seems probable from several expressions of holy writ." (601)

With respect to the urim and thummim, Wines wrote:

"Four principal opinions have obtained as to what they were. The first is that they were two small images, which, enclosed within the fold of the breast-plate, gave out the oracular answers. This is the idea of Philo Judaeus, in which he has been followed by later writers. But it is too heathenish a conceit to be for a moment entertained. It had been well characterized as 'a Talmudical camel, which no one in his wits can ever swallow.' A second opinion is, that the urim and thummim consisted in a peculiar radiance, or shining light, with which certain of the letters, engraven on the breast-plate, were invested, when a question had been put; so that these luminous characters, being properly arranged, gave the answer to the inquiry. This was the notion of Josephus. Dr.
Prideaux has triumphantly refuted it; but his answer is too long to be inserted here. A third opinion is that of Michaelis, in which he is followed by Jahn. These writers think, that the urim and thummim were simply a sacred box. They suppose it probable, that three stones were used, one of them marked with an affirmative; a second, with a negative; and the third, blank; and that Moses commanded these to be kept within the doubling of the breast-plate of the priest. This of course would require the question always to be put in such a way, that it could be answered with a simple yes or no. But there are various responses in the scriptures, inconsistent with the truth of this theory; especially that contained in 2 Sam. 5: 23, 24, where explicit and detailed directions are given. The fourth opinion is that of Prideaux, who thinks that by urim and thummim we are not to understand any thing visible and corporeal, but only a divine virtue and power, given to the breast-plate in consecration, of obtaining oracular answers from God, whenever counsel was asked of him by the high priest, in the prescribed manner. Amid this conflict of opinion, one thing seems sufficiently evident, that the answers were rendered in an audible voice, and that the breast-plate, bearing the names of the twelve tribes, invested the high priest with his true representative character, and thus enabled him successfully to ask counsel of God." (588) The text also includes a skewed history of the Church titled "Gold Bible - Mormonism" (212-217).

Comment: As an appendix, Turner included an excerpt "from manuscripts of Thomas Morris" concerning Jemima Wilkinson and her followers. Morris relates how Wilkinson "pretended to have had revelations from heaven" to direct her followers. She "dubbed"

Below, I have extracted passages that are in some ways similar to LDS thought about the role of women.

Researcher: Derek Jensen

Excerpt (pages): "The husband and wife are regarded by the Mosaic law as one person, having, as it were, but one soul, one interest, one will. Doubtless the doctrine, that the man is the head of the woman, and that the property of the latter becomes, as a result of the nuptial tie, part and parcel of that of the former, is sometimes productive of much hardship and suffering; but who, that reflects on the frailities and passions of human nature, can doubt, that the contrary doctrine, adopted and applied as a practical principle of legislation, would be attended with evils far greater, both in number and magnitude?" (434)

After talking about the "man's mission" Wines wrote: "Woman's mission, while it has no less of dignity, is very different from this. It is to be the light and joy of the household, to nourish and train the immortal children within its precincts, to mould the whole mass of mind while in its most plastic state, to fill the throne of the heart, to be the priestess in the sanctuary of home, to be the comfort and support of man in seasons of sorrow and of suffering, to move in the realm of ignorance and want, to shine, to cheer, and to bless in all the varied ministrations of sympathy and love, from the cradle to the grave. What purer, nobler, holier realm can she desire?" (434-435)

Library Location: 051 B reels 248-250 Microfilm (v.1 is at the end of reel 248, reel 249 consists of volumes 2-4, and reel 250 consists of volumes 5-7)

There is a useful index at the back of each volume. The paper relayed interesting information regarding contemporary archeology and missionary efforts to American Indians and others.

Comment: In the process of extracting information from the entire run of the Weekly Recorder, I remembered that I needed to look specifically at the issue which Grunder had for sale. For April 30, 1819, Grunder found the Weekly Recorder interesting because it highlighted religious zeal among youths and relayed Native American conversions. I find this particular issue interesting because of what it says about intemperance, moral faculties, and man as an "enemy to God." (Mosiah 3:19). I have extracted two paragraphs from this article that have some resemblance to language used in the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants. The Word of Wisdom promises us that we will find wisdom and treasures of knowledge. This passage reminds us that we will lose wisdom and knowledge if we fall into the vice of drunkenness.

Researcher: Derek Jensen
Excerpt (pages): "Of all the catalogue of vices there are none whose destructive effects in a moral sense, can be compared to drunkenness. The memory, the understanding, the moral faculties, are at once impaired, debilitated, and destroyed. Every avenue to reflection is effectually closed up; and the situation of the man who is given up to this indulgence, may with truth be considered as extremely perilous."

"Above all, he is an enemy to God, the great God of heaven and earth; to him who surrounds him on every side, and who can in a moment end his life, and send him quick into hell. He is continually affronting Jehovah to his face, and setting him at open defiance. He is an enemy to Christ, to the Lord that bought him. He fled in the face of his authority; and sets at naught his sovereign power and tender love. He crucifies him afresh; and when he calls him his Saviour, what is it but to betray him with a kiss?" Comment: This comes from the editor's introduction to first issue of the Weekly Recorder, in which he declares the state of the world "as fraught with events of the utmost consequence to the church of Christ. On the one hand, it is remarkable for wars and commotions, wasting and destruction dreadful human slaughter, and garments rolled in blood. Comment: McKenney describes a possible Indian cataclysm. See 3 Nephi 21.
Excerpt (pages): Never before has Providence revealed its purposes, with so much distinctness, at least to my mind, in regard to our duty to this unfortunate race, as now. Every barrier which hitherto existed between the purposes of the good and merciful, and the aborigines of this country, are seen to be removed, and the way thrown wide open for the statesman, the Christian, and the philanthropist, to preserve and save the remnants of this long harassed, and persecuted people.
The Indians have been driven from the east to the west of the Mississippi, and beyond the western confines of Missouri and Arkansas, for good or for evil. This movement has not been made by chance, or accident. There are ends to be answered by it, which it behooves this nation to look well to. God, and not chance, governs the world; and it is with him, and his laws, we, as a nation, have to do, in reference to this Indian subject. That eye that never sleeps has taken note of all the oppressions and cruelties, the wrongs and outrages, which, as a people, we have inflicted on this Indian race. Is God just? Who can doubt it? Will he not vindicate his laws when these are violated in relation to the Indians, with the same certainty as when they are defied and trampled on in their relation to white men? If the blood of Abel cried form the ground to God, and the bolt of retribution was discharged upon Cain, until the ain it inflicted forced from the murderer the exclamation, "My punishment is greater than I can bear"-is there not reason to apprehend, in view of the Indian blood, with which so much of the soil of this country has been made red, that a day of retribution will come, when ample atonement will be required by that Being whose every attribute is opposed to the treatment the Indians have been receiving at our hands, for over two hundred years? What an accumulation of wrath! How fierce, should the cloud with which it is surcharged not be delivered of it by the appropriate means, and how destructive will be its emissions!
I have said the Indians are, where they are, for good or for evil. It is for the government and people of this country to decide which—nor is there, in my opinion, any time to be lost. We cannot flatter ourselves with the belief that the Indians entertain for us feelings of kindness, or sympathy of any sort. They have been made to feel too keenly the wrongs we have inflicted on them. They are not ignorant of the past. They know what they relations are now, and what they have always been, between us and them; nor are they ignorant of the superior advantages which their present condition affords for a suitable retaliation, whenever the time should arrive, bringing with it a favorable opportunity for its exercise, or a cause occur forcing them to the overt act.
If I had been called upon to locate the Indian population upon a territory better situated than all others for their successful annoyance of this nation, I should have chosen the very territory upon which they are now concentrated. They have only to will it, and a war more costly, and more bloody, will ensue, than any that has ever yet been inflicted upon this country. Philip, and Pontiac, and Tecumseh, and Osceola, have read us lessons on the capacity of the Indians to revenge themselves; but never in all their history did they occupy a position so formidable as that which is now held by their successors.
I will suppose, the purpose formed by those Indians to resist any new attempts on our part to push them further to the west; or to remove them under any forms from the country they now occupy; or that they should resolve to revenge the wrongs done them in all the past, without any further attempt on our part to add to them. What would be the first movement of these eighty thousand men? For I hold it they could concentrate that number. Ir would be by that silent preparation which would be as still as the calm before the storm, to reise upon, and by a system adapted to such a purpose, and which the Indians know how to continue, destroy the population of Missouri and Arkansas, almost at a blow, cross the Mississippi, burning and killing, as they advanced, all before them, till they should reach Pittsburgh. And this might all be accomplished, and themselves again on the west of the Mississippi, before an army could be concentrated to attack them. And before this army could be prepared to take the field, they would adopt the guerrilla practice of fighting-taking care to drive the buffalo before them, securing, by this means, their own subsistence, and to burn the prairies, thus depriving the enemy of its cavalry and artillery; for, if the means to subsist horses should be destroyed, the big guns could not be employed. Should they be pursued to the Rocky Mountains, the war they would carry on from the fastnesses there, would be terrible; if forced over the;m, and down towards the Pacific, their means of subsistence would be still congenial to their wants; and if, at last, as would be the cast, the last man of them should perish, it would be at a cost so mighty to us, as may well demand of the statesman a suitable attention to this momentous subject, and in time to avoid the contingency that might produce the conflict.
This will not be by the erection of forts and batteries, or by means of coercion of any sort.
It can be accomplished, in my humble opinion, only by the means I have suggested. It is high time that a policy other than that of force and cruelty, were employed in our intercourse with the Indians.

Comment: McKenney outlines his later belief that relocation beyond the Mississippi will be beneficial for the Indians, and that when given possession of their own territory, they will model it after the existing states and achieve their full potential as assimilated Americans. It illustrates the still surviving hope that the "vanishing race" would not vanish, but be coopted into the American pattern.
Excerpt (pages): It is proposed, in the first place, to give them a country, and to secure it to them by the most ample and solemn sanctions, suitable in all respects, in exchange for theirs; to pay them for all their improvements-and see them, free of cost, to their new homes- to aid them after their arrival there-and protect them;-- to put over them , at once, the frame-work of a government, and to fill this up as their advancement in civilization may require it; to secure them over their country, for the enlightening of the rising generation; and give them the Gospel. In fine, it is proposed to place them in a Territorial relation to us, and in all respects; and in the enjoyment of all the privileges consequent upon such a relation, civil, political and religious. Thus will they attain an elevation, to which, in their present relations, they can never aspire. And thus would new influences be created, ennobling in their tendencies, and animating in their effects. Under these, the Indian would rise into the distinction to which he has always been a stranger; and live and act with reference to the corresponding honors and benefits of such a state.

Publisher: Warner and Hanna
Date of Publication: 1805

Nature of Source: A sermon discussing Swedenborgian doctrine and scriptural interpretation, especially as it pertains to the Millennium and to establishment of the Swedenborgian New Church. Hargrove belongs to the Church of the New Jerusalem, rather than the General Conference. This branch of the movement considers Swedenborg's books as revelation from God.
Comment: D&C 50:24, Prov. 4:18. Hargrove's association of the proverb builds on the association of light and knowledge, and mentions an idea of universal progression for all of God's creations. He asserts that people at the time of Christ's ministry were not prepared for deeper truths of the gospel, which God left unrevealed until now, implying the "revelations" of Emanuel Swedenborg.
Excerpt (pages): "Such ignorant and bigoted opposers to the growing state of gospel knowledge, should reflect, however, that there is a sure promise left unto the Church of God, that 'The path of the just shall be as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day;' or as it is elsewhere expressed, that in the latter days, 'the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sever fold, even and the light of seven days.' -Hence, when he who was the 'Light of the world' appeared on earth 'in the likeness of sinful flesh,' He plainly and positively declared that (over and above what he then had revealed) be had 'many more things' to announce, which, at that period they were 'not able to bear;' But that nevertheless, the time should come, when a brighter dispensation of Gospel truths should be afforded us, particularly respecting the true nature of the holy trinity, or object of Christian worship.--(see St. John's Gospel xxii. Chapter, 12th and 25th verses.) [preface]

The New Jerusalem Church, however, can perceive no good reasons to be astonished or offended, with at the Jews, or former Christians, for not having as yet, adopted the peculiar faith of the New Church, on the subject before us-confident, that a great degree of our religious differences on this and other profound passages of the scriptures, originate in the imperfection, and depravity of our nature, in its present lapsed and fallen state;-while at the same time they also think it not improbable, that part of these differences may be traced up to the order of Divine Providence, whose general design seems to be, that every created thing, but especially the human mind, should gradually advance from lesser states of perfection to greater;-thus causing 'the path of the just to shine brighter, and brighter unto the perfect day.'"p6

Nature of Source: A sermon discussing Swedenborgian doctrine and scriptural interpretation, especially as it pertains to the Millennium and to establishment of the Swedenborgian New Church. Hargrove belongs to the Church of the New Jerusalem, rather than the General Conference. This branch of the movement considers Swedenborg's books as revelation from God.
Comment: Hargrove explains the New Jerusalem church is the third in a succession of dispensational churches, and the consummation of history. He sees the change in dispensation from the former Christian church to the New Jerusalem church as the spiritual fulfillment of the prophecy of a new heaven and new earth. The Swedenborgian interpretation of the Bible is an extremely allegorical one, even concerning the nature of God. The principle mode of divine intervention in human affairs is an infusion of Godly wisdom and love, which provides for a very liberal, anthropocentric belief.

Excerpt (pages): The aggregate number of all who are justly entitled to the appellation of believers in divine revelation, may, with considerable propriety, be arranged under three distinct classes: To wit, The Jewish Church, the past or former Christian Church, and the New Jerusalem Church; which latter church, is now forming, by the Lord, in various parts of the earth, through the medium of the Theological writings of that profound philosopher and Heavenly-taught-Seer, BARON EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. And, notwithstanding each of these churches, equally and cordially subscribe to the divine authority and inspiration of the book of Psalms; yet it is equally certain that each of them has adopted some leading sentiments upon the subject, now before us [of a messiah or second coming of Christ], peculiar to themselves and distinct from each other...[he summarizes Jewish and Christian belief].

The men of the New Jerusalem Church, however, differ very considerably, from each of the former churches, in their ideas of the true meaning of the subject now before us-affirming, that the Messiah, not only came into the world, 'in the flesh,' in the days of Augustus Caesar, but also, that he has actually effected his second general advent, 'in the spirit,' not many years ago-by a gracious revelation of the spiritual sense of his holy word, in which, he may be said to have his more immediate residence;—And, that he has thereby effected an exploration, and judgment unto condemnation, upon all those evil and false principles, which have too long obtained, and reigned in the world, and have brought the first period of the Christian Church to its consummation;—and that this is what is signified in the sacred pages, by the destruction of the former heavens, and the former earth, and the creation of new heavens and a new earth in their place."p5

Comment: Priest argues against the belief that Elijah must bodily fulfill the prophecy in Malachi before the Second Coming.

Excerpt (pages):
"7th. Some Millinarians have imagined that Elijah the prophet is yet to come, as a forerunner of the Messiah's second advent. They disallow that John the Baptist was Elijah, because, say they, he did not do the work foretold of him by Malachi, "which was to turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers." Mal. iv.6. This work is supposed by them will be accomplished by the real Elijah, when he comes as a forerunner of the second advent of Christ. But that opinion has its refutation in the assertion of Christ, who well knew whether John the Baptist was Elias or not. Nature of Source: A lengthy treatise on biblical prophecy, including personal opinion and theorizing by Priest.

Comment: While outlining the Biblical history, Priest includes his version of the Enoch story. He interprets Enoch's mission and especially translation as a sign of the impending flood.

Excerpt (pages): "Of their [antediluvians'] works, therefore, the holy Enoch reproved them, and perhaps told them, that if God had so severely judged Adam, they might not expect to escape some signal punishment. At which rebukes they were, unquestionably, enraged, and no doubt proceeded to lay violent hands upon him, to take away his life; but in the midst of their fury, God caught him up from their sight. He was a man in the prime of life, being three hundred and sixty-five years old when he was translated; but had waled with God three hundred years. Consequently, he was born again at the age of sixty-five. This holy man, who had been among them a preacher of righteousness, as Noah was, in after years, was no doubt translated in open sight, as was Elijah, near the fords of Jordan. This circumstance should therefore have been received of them, as an evident sign, that God sanctioned Enoch, and consequently condemned them." p 54-55.
In explaining the fall and Satan's "little season" at the close of the Millennium, Priest explains the need for temptation, enabling agency to exist. Excerpt (pages): "But if there had been no fallen evil being [Satan], a mode of trial in some of other manner must have ensued, or man could never have manifested a voluntary choice of either good or evil; and consequently a probationary state could never have called into action that glorious power, viz. rational free agency."p330.

McKenney illustrates the contemporary idea of the Indians "blossoming as a rose"-through assimilation and loss of separate Indian identity. McKenney views this as a material development which will occur under the tutelage of whites, not a spiritual or political rejuvenation accomplished by the hand of God.

Excerpt (pages): It was to this state of things our fathers looked. We have found, they doubtless said, this singular being to be unmanageable; but when this empire shall have become established, and the sceptre of freedom be swayed over its teeming population, then, surely, will that which is now literally a wilderness to the Indian, be made to blossom as the rose; and then will his solitary places become glad. No longer able to bury himself in his forests, or subsist on their game, or measure strength with the white man, he will yield to necessity, resort to the earth for his support, and practice gladly those lessons which are at present lost upon him. Then will be displayed before his eyes, the neat, well-cultivated farm, and the flocks covering the pastures. The earth will pour out her treasures in his very presence. He well imitate all he sees. The wigwam will be made to give place to the cottage, and thrift and comfort success to improvidence and want. Then will he and the white man be one in feeling, one in principles, one in friendship, one in the enjoyment of the same happiness; and they well be seen together in the long vista of the future, brothers in the arts and conveniences of cultivated life.

Excerpt (pages): We stop to indulge in useless lamentations over what has been done; or to arraign "the ways of Providence to man;" or question his merciful designs in peopling this land with a race such as ours? The first would be useless, and the last impious. This country, in the plans of the Eternal, was to be the empire of freedom, and of mind. Here, in the purposes of infinite wisdom, it was determined, that science, and the arts, and religion, should flourish, and man attain, untrammeled by bigotry, the highest state of perfection and happiness, of which his nature is susceptible. All this was to be, and it has been. Nor were any of the consequences, which have attended the accomplishment of these purposes, unforeseen by Infinite Wisdom, even to those which have been so destructive in their effects upon the Indians. But it was not given to man to penetrate the mysterious purposes of the Infinite; we, therefore, resolve all this into those inscrutable dispensations, which, in the futurity, we may expect to see revealed in all their godlike forms.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

But for any part we may have taken, as willing instruments in producing, or not taken, in preventing the miserable condition of the Indians, we must expect to be held accountable. Heaven, we doubt not, wills the happiness of man. Under this belief, it becomes our duty to look at the condition of the Indian, as we see it, and it being one of great suffering, and degradation, seek for the best means for his relief. 237-8

Date of Publication: 1825

Nature of Source: A book borrowing from James Adair and Elias Boudinot to prove the Indians are from the lost tribes of Israel, and then to urge their restoration as part of the millennial work of the Lord.

Comment: Smith is proud of the American role in restoring the Indians to Jerusalem, but avoids making explicit mention of the deportation.

Excerpt (pages): Such promises of the restoration of Israel from far countries, form the west or the going down of the sun, from the coasts of the earth, from the ends of the earth, from isles afar, their being brought in ships from afar, making their way in the sea, their path in the mighty water; these expressions certainly well accord with the ten tribes being brought form America. And such passages imply an agency by which such a restoration shall be effected. Where shall such an agency be so naturally found, as among a great Christian people, providentially planted on the very ground occupied by the outcast tribes of Israel in their long exilement; and who are so happily remote from the bloody scenes of Europe in the last days, as to have leisure for the important business assigned? Surely then this business would be assigned, either tacitly or expressly, to our nation.p182.

By prayer, contributions, and your influence, be prepared to aid every attempt for the conversion of the Jews and Israel; and God will be his own interpreter, and will make the duty plain.p190-91.
then the Christian Gentiles came into possession of the blessings of this covenant, under its last, the Christian dispensation. But this event is only until the fulness of the gentiles be come in Rom xi.25 Then shall the Hebrews again take their place, as God's first born. (Jer xxxi.20,21; Zech.i.16;Isai.lx.) Let us then be active in restoring their long lost blessing. p192.

Elevate them above the wilds of barbarism and death, by showing them what has been done for their nation; and what is yet to be done by the God of their Fathers, in the line of his promise. p193.

The wings of your continent have long borne him in his banishment. Now let the wings of your liberty, compassion, and blessed retreat, bear him from his dreary wilds to the temple of God. p192

Go, thou nation highly distinguished in the last days; save the remnant of my people.- Bring me a present of them "to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the Mount Zion" [Isaiah 18:7] p193.

May the supplicants of God in the west, in the land of the shadowing with wings, be hid in that day of the Lord's anger. The author seems to indicate that the gentile church has gained all the promises and blessings made to ancient Israel, and does not focus on their restoration as a condition for the second coming.
Excerpt (pages): "Besides, we ought not to forget the reasoning of the Apostle Paul on this subject, in which he compares the Jews to the favoured "olive tree" planted in the vineyard of God (Roman 11:16-19). The branches became unfruitful and were broken off; and the Gentiles, branches of the wild olive tree, were grafted into their place. "Boast not then," says he, "against the branches; but if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee! Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off that I might be grafted in. Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high minded, but fear; for if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee." -We are hence taught not only to prize and preserve the privileges to which we are advanced in their stead, but to exercise toward them, notwithstanding their excision, and under all their debasement, our compassionate regards. The very consideration that through their unbelief we have obtained the adoption, that because of their slighting the Gospel it was preached to the Gentiles, and that we inherit the blessings to which they were heirs, should excite our sympathy for them, and mingle prayers in their behalf with the ardours of acknowledgment for the privileges which have been taken from them and extended to us. Nature of Source: A lengthy treatise on biblical prophecy, including personal opinion and theorizing by Priest.
Comment: Josiah Priest ruminates on the possible overpopulation of the earth during the millennium, and which acts of God will be necessary to stave off a Malthusian crash. This passage indicates that Priest did not expect a radical change in ecology accompanying the Second Coming, but he considers it likely that God will later make deserts arable.

Excerpt (pages): "But if there is to be no death during the Millennium, (as previously argued) and if there is to be a multiplication of men without any diminution during a thousand years, will not the earth, in consequence, become overcharged with an immensity of multitudes, as well in the latter case as in the former, and thus produce death even during the Millennium? This will not be the consequence; and the following reasons are thought sufficient to obviate such a supposition: first, it well require many years to retrieve the immense loss occasioned by the sudden overthrow of all the wicked just previous to the Millennium, which perhaps will amount to two thirds of the whole population of the globe.
A second reason is, at the commencement of the Millennium there will be, as it is now, vast tracts of waste land in various parts of the globe, which must thereafter be subdued and cultivated. Those countries where the soil is cultivated, in many of them it is but partially done, and therefore will admit of a much higher state of husbandry, consequently the more capable of maintaining an increase of population. But if need be, God can easily restore and fertilize all barren lands, even the sandy deserts of Arabia, an all similar desolations, and clothe them with the verdure of the first Eden, as once he healed a tract of barren country by the means of the prophet Elisha, not far from the place where Elijah was translated; and thus an abundance of space shall be prepared for the increasing million of the Millennial state."p279-80.

Comment: Priest argues against post-millennial gradualism or a pluralistic view of who will survive into the millennium.
Excerpt (pages): It is probable the most popular idea about the commencement of the Millennium, is, that there will be a gradual reformation, from year to year, until the whole of mankind, generally speaking, shall be favourably disposed towards religion; when a general morality shall prevail throughout the world. Such a state as this, is also supposed by many, will be the condition of the world during the Millenium. But if Christ, relative to the Church, in the days of St. John, expressed himself as abominating all luke warm souls, and threatened to spue them out of his mouth, or cast them down to hell, as I understand it to mean; how, then, in the Millennium, when it is expressly stated that all shall be holy, can it be consistent that there then shall be any mere moralists to nauseate the bosom of the Millenial Church? p87-88.

Although there is some attempt at balancing an account of the injustices inflicted by either side on the other, and while giving an accurate synopsis of the Book of Mormon, Kirk ultimately blames the founders of Mormonism for spurring poor souls into a fanaticism which ultimately had to be wiped out.
Comment: Kirk comments on the authorship and invention of the Book of Mormon.
Excerpt (pages): Whatever of credit is to be allowed to the genius and sagacity of Jo Smith in the arrangement and management of his impostures, it must be admitted on all hands that the great mystery, the keystone of his plan, the romance of the American Indians, required to all transcendent flight of excenctric genius, in its suggestion. For it is a fact well known, that, among all the historians of the American Indians who have ventured upon conjectures concerning their origin and descent, by far the greatest number have agreed in the supposition, that they were descendants of the ancient Hebrews, more likely than of any other nation of antiquity of which we have any account. These conjectures and suppositions were well known, long before Joseph Smith made his appearance in the world: so that the greatest admirers of Smith's genius as a successful imposter, cannot claim for him the merit of originality upon this, the great corner stone of his plan. The Book of Mormon is precisely such a structure as we might have expected such an imposter as Jo Smith, would have erected on this foundation: and when we consider the great number of coincidences, sanctions, and corrobosrations which Jo has been able to draw from the Bible ot build up his creed, it must be admitted that it is more a subject of wonder tat some one of the legion of impostors who have figured in the world sicne the fifteenth century, had not struck upon this plan before, then that at length it penetrated the brain of Jo Smith.p63.

Title of Book: History of Baptist Indian Missions
Title of Article:
Title of Publication:
Place of Publication: Washington, D.C.
Publisher: William M. Morrison
Date of Publication: 1840
Library Location: Fiche 4 E 98
Nature of Source: An inclusive history of Baptist Indian missions during the early nineteenth century. Due to McCoy's prominence in the missions, the record is identical to his personal journal in many places.

Comment: McCoy's observations on the topic are separated from the rest of his book by inclusion in an introduction. He believes the Indians have changed very little from their post-migratory condition until the coming of Europeans, and he has little patience for the elaborate theories and justifications circulated during his time. Although he opposes several aspects of Indian history propounded in the Book of Mormon, the examples and phrases he employs suggest he is primarily replying to James Adair, Elias Boudinot, Ethan Smith, and subsequent authors in the same vein. It should be noted, however, that McCoy uses the inclusive term "Israel" rather than "Lost Ten Tribes," thus possibly including the Book of Mormon as well as the other documents.

Excerpt (pages):
"At what period, in what manner, and from what place the aboriginal tribes came to America, or to which of the nations of the earth they are most nearly related, are questions that never can be satisfactorily answered. The most common opinion in regard to their descent, and one which our minds seem predisposed to adopt, is, that they are the descendants of Israel. Volumes have been written in favour of this hypothesis, and the evidences in its support have been presented in the most imposing manner, but such proof as in necessary to a belief of the fact assumed is still wanting.  p9
"History will be just such as we ought to expect from a people who keep no records, who have no established system of giving or receiving instruction, and who are not in the habit of burdening their minds with study or reflection." p16

"In speculations, which were rather idle than useful, we have sometimes been told of the advances which man has made from a barbarous to a civilized state, and step after step has been pointed out, as though civilized nations had risen from this barbarism; the truth is, that no nation, since the world was made, excepting that aboriginal tribes of our continent, ever existed in the barbarous state supposed. Adam and his sons were not in this barbarous condition-Cain was an agriculturalist, and Abel was a shepherd. Noah and his family left the ark and entered upon similar pursuits. And ever since, the most barbarous nations have had domesticated animals, have known the use of iron, and in some other respects have been superior to the lowest state of barbarous existence. The aborigines of this continent had no domestic animals except their dogs, which so nearly resemble the wolf as to justify the belief that they are of the same species. They manufactured no metals and no cloths. . . . Here [At the time of their arrival] man begins a state of existence as if in another world, where all is unknown except the brook at which he slakes his thirst; without an implement of iron to fell a tree, to plow the ground, to butcher an animal of the forest for food, or to catch a fish in the waters, or even to dig a root from the earth; no spinning-wheel or loom on which to manufacture a garment, and no seed-corn from the mother country.* [*Maize, or Indian corn, was indigenous and peculiar to America. The small grains, such as wheat, rye, &c., have been brought from other countries to this.] They have everything to learn; and the brevity of life (especially under the calamities of this new state of things) soon deprives this destitute race of profitable recollections of the arts of life of the mother country. No book of record preserves the story, or encourages succeeding generations to improve their condition, by telling the of what is done in other lands.p18-19

"In this condition they were found by Europeans. The latter seeing many places at which Indians had once resided, left destitute of inhabitants, supposed that the neighboring tribes had once been such more numerous than they were at that time-but of this there is no evidence. The story of a fatal disease having nearly depopulated large districts in the regions of New England, a short time before the landing of the Pilgrims of Plymouth, is improbable, and the mistake is easily accounted for by all who are acquainted with the Indians in their own country. Their necessities often compel them to change the location of settlements.

The supposition that they had either been preceded by a more civilized people, or had themselves degenerated from a more civilized state, is also unfounded. Ancient mounds, fortifications, and other indications of the residence of human beings, made probably centuries before the sprouting of our oldest oaks, show that they were made by savage and not civilized men. . . . All which prove that our modern Indians are really the aboriginal race, and that they never had been more civilized than they were when we first became acquainted with them.

Nature of Source: Thorowgood's book does less to prove his title than might be expected. He does devote a couple chapters to evidences that the Indians are Jews, but uses proofs which have near universal application (e.g. dancing, washing themselves often, breastfeeding their own children). He speaks about New England, the need to proselytize the Indians rather than other Christian sects, and the vagaries of the Spanish (black legend). The book would be most useful for its connection with cross-cultural contact; while describing the conversion of some Indians under the leadership of one Waaubon not only does Thorowgood list the behavior and (monetary) penalties required of the converts, but also lists their questions about Christianity, which illustrate many differences in belief and culture as well as the Indians' efforts to understand.

He also relates promises that after this group receives "many things," from another people, they will emerge from their isolation and conquer the entire world.

Excerpt (pages): Thy brethren the sonnes of Israel were by divine providence brought into these Countrys, God doing many miracles fore them, which thou wouldst not believe, if I should well them to thee as I have heard them of my Fathers; Wee Indians went into those Countries and made warre against them, and did use them worse then the Spaniards doe us: Afterwards by the command of our Mahanes (these are their Sorcerers) wee went as Souldiers towards those parts where thou hast seen thy Brethren, to wage warre with them, and of all those that entred there, not one came backe againe alive; wee made a great Armie, and entring into his lands, all fell downe dead, so that not one escaped; at last wee raised another Army, for the making of which the Countrey was dispeopled wholly, so that none but old men, women and children remained therein, which came to an end as the former had done; which those who remained alive, and were not gone to that warre perceiving, said, that the Mohanes had deceived them and were the cause of the death of their Fathers, for which they deserved to be put to death, having then killed manhy of them, those that remained alive did intreat them to hearken to them, and they would discover to them all the truth of that which they knew, which having gotten leave, declared that which followeth.

Nature of Source: A lengthy treatise on biblical prophecy, including personal opinion and theorizing by Priest.

Comment: After quoting Revelation 20:6, Priest first explains that the reign of the saints with Christ will take place in heaven, consistent with his view that Christ does not reign personally on the Earth. The following extract, while not presenting peculiar biblical insight, gives a positive definition of priesthood, connecting this priesthood with a joint saintly reign with Christ.

Excerpt (pages): "But as it relates to them being priests of God and of Christ, this also shall be accomplished in the invisible world, as well as in the visible; and the manner of that priesthood will undoubtably consist both of praise to God, and of service, in obedience to his commands. It is argued by Dr. Clark, that the saints on earth are reckoned a spiritual building, or temple, in which God is worshipped, and in which he manifests himself as he did in the temple of old. And that every stone, son or daughter being a spiritual sacrificer, or priest, is therefore the priesthood spoken of by the apostle Peter. 1 Peter 2, 5, and by the Revelator, 5, 10. And hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth. To which I add, that if the saints on earth are reckoned the lively stones of that spiritual building, in which each saint is a spiritual worshipper, or sacrificing priest, then indeed those who shall arise from the dead at the first resurrection, and ascend to glory, must be reckoned also as kings and priest, for they shall sit on thrones. See Rev. 20, 4. And I saw thrones, and they that sat upon them, and they shall be crowned. See the second epistle of Paul to Timothy, chap. 2, 8." p265-66.

Excerpt (pages): Possibly, the restoration may be near enough to include even a portion of these interesting people [the Indians] . . .The Jewish people must now do something for themselves; they must move onward to the accomplishment of that great event long foretold-long promised-long expected; and when they DO move, that mighty power which has for thousands of years rebuked the proscription and intolerance shown to the Jews, by a benign protection of the whole nation, will still cover them with his invincible standard. My belief is that Syria will revert to the Jewish nation by purchase, and that the facility exhibited in the accumulation of wealth, has been a providential and peculiar gift to enable them, at a proper time, to re-occupy their ancient possessions by the purse-string instead of the sword. . .twelve or thirteen million dollars have been spoken of in reference to the cession of that interesting territory [from turkey-to help the British balance of power in the east], a sum of no consideration to the Jews, for the good will and peaceable possession of a land, which to them is above all price. Under the conoperation and protection of England and France, this re-occupation of Syria within its old territorial limits, is at once reasonable and practicable. p37-38.

Excerpt (pages): [Parsons quotes Jeremiah 29: 10, 14; Ezekiel 37:21, 25]. " Let these two predictions fall into the hands of a Jew, contemporary with the prophet Jeremiah. He reads the former, and says, 'My brethren are to be captives at Babylon, seventy years, after that they are to return to their own land, and be a beloved people.' He reads the latter, 'My Brethren are to go again into captivity, so long a captivity that it will be said of Jerusalem, it has been always waste; they shall be cast our from God, excluded from all their religious, and civil privileges, even till the latter days; then they shall return to the land which was given to our Father Abraham. God himself well dwell with them, and establish with them an everlasting covenant which shall never be forgotten.'
Place the same predictions in the hands of a Christian, who has the advantage of looking back upon the accomplishment of one of them. Does he object to a literal interpretation of the latter, because there is figurative language attached to it. He finds figurative language in the other; yet the Jews did literally return. Would not an impartial examination of these two predictions, recorded precisely in the same terms, constrain him to adopt the sentiment, that as one was literally fulfilled, the other must be. The outcasts of Israel will yet be gathered to their own land."pp9-10

Title of Book: Essay on the Propagation of the Gospel

Title of Article:

Title of Publication:

Place of Publication: Philadelphia

Publisher: James Humphreys

Date of Publication: 1801

Library Location: special collections

Nature of Source: Crawford's booklet builds on James Adair's History of the American Indians, drawing the conclusions of missionary work and migration from the biblical prophecies.

Comment: Crawford describes how Indians, who he regards as Israelites, will leave America to return to Palestine before the second coming.

Excerpt (pages): It is a circumstance of worthy of peculiar regard, that societies should be immediately formed over the entire United States, and British Provinces, for the purpose of civilizing and Christianizing the Indians.

It is probable when the time arrives; foretold by the prophets, that the Jews will be gathered from their dispersion among all nations, many of the Indians will pass over at Beering's or Cook's Straits, into Asia. It is said of the Almighty by the prophet, "for lo I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth." Amos ix.9-And Isaiah says "I will bring thy seed from the East, and gather thee from the West. I will say to the North give up; and to the South keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth," xliii; 5 and 6.

These prophecies should induce the whole people of America to treat the Indians with as much lenity and forbearance as possible. We reason from "the sure word of prophecy" according to the expression of the Apostle, when we say, that all the descendants of the house of Israel, among which are many Indians, will be restored to the land of their forefathers. This will probably happen about the conclusion of the present century, somewhere near the year 1900. Many of the Indians will then relinquish their land to the white people. Upon the restoration of the Jews it is said, that the land will be too small to contain them and that they will wish its borders to be enlarged. "For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction, shall even now be too narrow by reason of thy inhabitants." Isaiah, xlix; 19.

We may conclude with certainty from the prophets that the restoration of the Jews will be literal as well as spiritual. Moses says, that when the Jews "return unto the Lord" he will bring them "into the land which their fathers possessed, and they shall possess it." Deuteronomy chap.30th The land of their forefathers can never be taken in a spiritual sense, but must literally mean the land of Israel.

Introduction
The Book of Abraham, translated by Joseph Smith between the years 1835 and 1842, advances many themes and images not attested in the original Genesis narrative. This has led to the frequent assertion that it stands outside the religious discourse of its day. Certainly the Mormon conceptualization of Abraham is vital and vibrant. And he occupies a place in Mormon thought that cannot be limited to the Pearl of Great Price. His image was further expanded in novel ways with the revelation of the 132 Section of the Doctrine and Covenants. Yet in what ways are these portrayals of Abraham unique? In their form, their content or some combination of the two? This paper argues that the uniqueness of the tradition lies in its theological content, rather than in the plot, themes or symbols that give it form.

Of the many possible examples of how Joseph's rich conceptualization of Abraham is unique, eight commonly cited examples are particularly salient to the current discussion:

1. First, the over-riding theme of the entire discourse is Abraham's role as the true and rightful heir to the priesthood (BA 1:1-3; 21-27).
2. This claim leads Abraham into conflict with a king who attempts to sacrifice him (BA 1:31).
3. The assertion that Abraham himself (rather than Moses) wrote a book that more accurately conveyed his own life story. Unlike any other book in the canon this one is illustrated. Through this medium Abraham comes to be seen as a link between the mysteries of the Egyptian past and the present; yet a strong claim is made that only the 'wisdom' tradition mediated by the patriarch is legitimate.

4. Abraham sees the heavens and teaches astronomy or astrology to the Egyptian (BA 3 esp 3:1-2, 15 and fac. 3).

5. Abraham relates an alternate creation narrative (BA 1:31; 4-5).

6. He is associated with the novel doctrine of 'uncreated' and coeternal intelligences and their role in a 'cooperative' process of creation (BA 3:13-14; 3:24-26, 4-5).

7. Abraham is imagined as a king or prince sitting on a throne (Fac. 3).

8. Lastly, Abraham through his promise of "eternal increase," is the role model of the 'New and Everlasting Covenant,' whether viewed in its plural or celestial forms. This spiritualized order of marriage is seen as a necessary step in the ongoing process of deification (D&C 132 esp. 29-37).

These elements together have lead many individuals to see the Mormon Abraham as a figure on the margins of the religious thought of the 19th century. This assessment is in fact only partially correct. While the dominant protestant schools of thought did not contain all of these themes or images (and certainly did not canonize them), some of them were generally available. Certain Bible dictionaries, collections of stories and hermetic traditions were available throughout the 19th century that related older Jewish material and esoteric speculation on these topics. Yet the purpose of the following paper is not to locate the sources available to Joseph, or the textual antecedents of the Book of Abraham. Others have already treated this topic extensively.1

Rather I wish to paint a fuller and more accurate picture of how Abraham was imagined in contemporaneous thought. To do this requires a survey of traditions available in the Christian, Jewish and Hermetic literatures. Once this survey has been undertaken it will be clear that what remains most unique to the LDS views of Abraham are its theological and philosophical implications, rather than the motifs from which it is constituted.

This is not to say that they appear in exactly the same form anywhere else, but that the basic themes are present. Generally speaking the motifs present in the Christian and Jewish literature tend have close parallels with the structure and story of the Book of Abraham, while the more esoteric Abraham of D&C 132 (associated with spiritualized orders of marriage and deification) finds its parallels in the alchemical literature. Many of these same hermetic sources also offer motifs and images similar to those surrounding the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. Clearly these sources deserve our close consideration.

Since others have discussed the main Christian and Jewish (both ancient and modern) antecedents of the Book of Abraham, I will begin by reviewing these topics relatively briefly.2

The remainder of the study then turns to an area that has yet to be discussed in the literature. While Brooke and Quinn have brought the issue of hermetic and magical influences on the formation of Mormon cosmology to the forefront of the academic discussion, there has yet to be a comprehensive treatment of the alchemical Abraham.\(^3\)

While other LDS scholars examining the issue of hermetic influence have tended to assert the purely 'symbolic,' rather than 'ritual' nature of 'chemical marriage,' or have pointed to shared proof texts held by both traditions (e.g. the Bible), I contend that the only way to asses claims of influence is to examine the actual content of the cosmological systems that are under discussion (motif criticism). When looked at in this perspective we will see that while themes and story elements may be shared, the theological message of the Book of Abraham remains unique. The number of philosophical and ontological differences that underlie Mormonism and Alchemy are great enough as to make direct borrowing (as proposed by Brooke) very difficult if not impossible. This general method can probably be extended beyond the issues of Abraham and the celestial/chemical marriage to other supposed cases of borrowing from the hermetic or magical environment.

scholars have long debated the degree to which Joseph and his work was a product of his environment. Also equally contested are differing visions of what that environment was and which cultural elements it might contain. It seems beyond doubt however that there was a dominant Protestant discourse in addition to whatever other elements may or may not have been present. This then is the best place to begin our review of contemporaneous views of Abraham.

Abraham, like other related issues, tends to create something of a dichotomy in the literature and reference materials of the 19th century. There are those views of the Patriarch that dare not to go beyond the canonized texts. And then there are others that are either aware of, or in some way endorse, a broader set of traditions. These traditions come from various sources. Received works, such as Josephus' Antiquities, may transmit them, or they may come from more recent translations of Jewish and Muslim sources. Many of the best parallels to the Abraham of the Pearl of Great Price (as opposed to the more esoteric Abraham of the Doctrine and Covenants) can be found in this literature.

In order to give the reader some idea of the variations of information and opinions that were available to the general Christian reader I undertook a survey of ten roughly contemporaneous Bible dictionaries and commentaries. These were chosen to cover the time period from 1830 (the year Joseph Smith began his inspired translation of the Bible) till the end of the century.\(^4\) These works were searched for the same key words used in the Book of Abraham section of the Archive of Restoration Culture.\(^5\) In addition I also added the terms 'astrology,' 'Egypt,' 'urim and thummim' and 'abrahamic covenant' to the list.

Not surprisingly many of these terms (such as 'Kolob' or 'Egyptus') failed to show up in any of the Bible dictionaries in our sample set. In practice the entries most likely to turn up interesting information were 'Abraham,' 'astrology,' 'Egypt' and 'urim and thummim.' We shall draw on all of these observations, but our focus will be on entries under simply 'Abraham,' as this is where the most novel information was consistently revealed.

The first group of dictionaries and commentaries reviewed offered little new or novel information not directly available from the Genesis text.\(^6\) The bulk of these entries seem to be paraphrases of the primary source. Typical of this school is an entry in the 1838 Union Bible Dictionary (second edition). Here we read:7

"While he [Abraham] was dwelling in his fathers house at Ur, God directed him to leave his country and kindred, and go to a land which would be shown him; promising, at the same time, to make of him a great nation, and to bless him, and to make his name great, and that in him all the families if of the earth should be blessed."

The account generally proceeds from there with a rather similar paraphrasing of the rest of the Abraham story. This general format is fairly typical of about 50% of the 19th century reference works in the total sample set. Indeed one wonders at time why the accounts were provided in the first place as their paraphrases of the original narrative could at times rival it in length and detail, but not in its poetry.

When additional explanation was needed, or some theological point derived from the narrative had to be reinforced, authors in all categories tended to turn to other Biblical books, and most especially the Pauline Corpus. For instance, in Matthew Henry's discussion of Abraham's decision to leave his homeland and follow the Lord's prompting Paul is used to bolster the author's reading:

> Note that those who deal with God must deal in trust; we must quite the things that are seen, for things that are not seen, and submit to the sufferings of this present time, in hopes of a glory that is yet to be revealed, Rom. 8. 18 for it doth not yet appear, what we shall be.

Other texts frequently cited include Stephen's recounting of Israel's formative events in the seventh chapter of the Book of Acts and Joshua 24:2-3, from which an almost universal consensus arose that Terah worshiped foreign gods. The theory is also expressed that Abraham may have also been guilt of the same sin in his youth.9

This same, highly conservative approach is visible in other areas of the literature besides reference works. In 1831 the Rev. Henry Blunt undertook to print a volume of 12 lectures on the life of Abraham.10 The single most remarkable feature of this work is its almost studied lack of originality. Only the original verses of Genesis were referenced, and these were often used rather superficially as touchstones for long addresses on more general questions of morality. No additional material on Abraham was examined, even though one would have thought that this would have been a necessity in a book length treatment of the "History of Abraham."

This 'studied indifference' to other traditions should not necessarily be construed as ignorance of them. For instance, the previously cited Henry Mathews entry on Abraham makes allusions to the Rabbinic literature, yet goes to lengths not to mention any of its relevant insights on the matter at hand.11 More and more of this sort of Jewish material was becoming available in English (and also German) throughout the first half of the 19th century. Some of it, such as Lightfoot's translations of substantial parts of the Jerusalem Talmud had been available since the 17th century. Instead of ignorance, the issue seemed to be a well-defined sense of the limits of the canon. It is not that these scholars could not uncover older traditions on the life of Abraham. In fact we can conjecture that many of them were quite well aware of such stories. They were simply deemed irrelevant to a bounded discussion of the Holy Scriptures.

This highly orthodox or conservative approach was not shared in all quarters. Five of the dictionaries or commentaries in the sample set, fully 50% of the total, contained substantial extra biblical illusions to, or discussion of, Abraham's life and
The publication dates of these sources (1830, 1832, 1837, 1839, 1863) defy the standard hypothesis (implicit in much of Nibley's work) that such material became available only in the later half of the 19th century after the extensive first wave of Rabbincic and ancient Jewish material was translated into English. As it would appear that this material was equally available to all authors of Bible dictionaries, the determining factor as to whether it was included seemed to have been ideas about the limits of the canon and what sort discussion or speculation fit within this realm.

Much of the available extra-biblical material appears to revolve around the Nimrod myth cycle. While this cycle would only become readily available in complete translations around the middle of the century, our current survey shows that it was sometimes included in reference works at and before the time Joseph was working on his Abraham material. One of the best examples in our survey set was found in the 1830 edition of the Pocket Dictionary of the Bible, published in Philadelphia by the American Sunday School Union.

Abraham son of Terah was born at Ur...He spent his early years in his fathers house where they adored idols. Many have supposed that he himself was at first engaged in this error, but that God gave him a better understanding, he renounced his impure mode of worship; and on this account suffered a severe persecution from the Chaldeans, who threw him into a fiery furnace, from which God miraculously saved him, while Haran, whose faith failed, perished in it.

So there in thumb-nail form we see the basic outlines of the Nimrod cycle being conveyed to the reader. From an LDS perspective the key ideas in this passage is that Abraham refused to worship the idols in Ur and would have been sacrificed to them if not for a miraculous intervention. This same theme is related, expanded upon, or hinted at in three other dictionaries of this category. Sometimes the king is explicitly mentioned and sometimes he is not (as in the above case).

What is most interesting about the previous account is the almost matter of fact way in which extra biblical materials were used to fill in a gap in the life history of Abraham. Not all of the sources that mention this material however were willing to take that same leap of faith. A more skeptical entry notes that:

The family of Abraham was idolatrous, for his "fathers served other gods beyond the flood," that is the great river Euphrates; but whether he himself was in the early period of his life and idolater, we are not informed by Moses. The Arabian and Jewish legends speak of his early idolatry, his conversion from it, and of his zeal in breaking the images in his father's house; but these are little to be depended upon.

Once again we see an even more truncated form of the Nimrod-cycle being conveyed, here focused on Abraham's private war against his father's idolatry. Yet this time the author's aim is to answer the myth, rather than incorporate it into his own vision of Abraham. One must wonder exactly how wide spread these 'Arabian and Jewish legends' were in 1832 for him to think such a step was necessary.
Another possible source for ancient traditions on Abraham that was readily available to all early 19th century readers, including church members, was Josephus.17

The works of Josephus were the only window that the West had into ancient Israel for centuries. This fact makes it surprising that only one of the dictionaries in our sample set explicitly cited Josephus under its 'Abraham' entry.18 However, with Josephus another important extra-biblical theme falls into the 19th century context. In William Smith's three volume Dictionary of the Bible we read:19

The traditions, which Josephus adds to the scriptural narrative, are merely such as, after his manner and in accordance with the aim of his writings, [to] exalt the knowledge and wisdom of Abraham, making him the teacher of monotheism to the Chaldeans, and of astronomy and mathematics to the Egyptian.

The contribution of Josephus to the western world's view of Abraham as an astrologer, or teacher of astronomy cannot be understated. This same theme will be seen repeatedly in the second half of the paper. A little farther down while discussing Muslim sources the same entry states:

Of the latter the most remarkable is the story of his [Abraham] having destroyed the idols (see Jud. V. 6-8), which Terah not only worshiped (as declared by Josh. xxiv. 2) but also manufactured, and having been cast by Nimrod into a fiery furnace, which turned to a pleasant meadow.

Here we see the King's role in Abraham's sacrifice clearly spelled out. The entry in Smith's Bible dictionary is also interesting in that it is aware that the story of the sacrifice in a fiery furnace was most likely the result of an expanded reading of the word 'Ur', which in Hebrew could mean either the name of the city, or 'fire.' Thus God may have delivered Abraham from the city Ur of the Chaldeans, or from the 'fire' of the Chaldeans. Other dictionaries in this sample set also seemed to be sensitive to this reading.20

Lastly, throughout the 19th century the archeological and scientific base of knowledge about Egypt and Mesopotamia grew immensely. This knowledge also helped to color how Abraham was portrayed. A good example of this is W. Robertson Nicoll's Expositor Bible (1839).

Rather than relying on received Jewish traditions to add color to his entries, he turns instead to archeological discovery.21 This allows him to discuss such interesting events as the building of the Temple of the Moon in UR, or to speculate that Abraham probably witnessed human sacrifice being carried out in its courtyard. From his newly acquired knowledge of the civilization he is also able to conclude that Abraham no doubt received instructed in astrology. It should be noted that none of this information really varied all that much from what could have been learned from ancient or medieval literary sources, but it was apparently novel to couch it in terms of archeology.

It is clear that there was a fairly diverse range of opinions and ideas about who and what Abraham was in the 19th century Protestant literature. Indeed this brief discussion has not begun to the exhaust the available material, and we have been forced to skip over many hotly contested debates all together (such as the normative value of Abraham's decision to lie about Sarah's identity, an issue on which there is no consensus in the sample set).

Yet we have seen certain themes and motifs repeated throughout the survey. First, it appears that the Nimrod cycle was fairly familiar to the authors of Bible dictionaries even before the Book of Jasher and other sources were published in English. Thus we can expect that certain individuals would have been familiar with its key motifs of Terah as an idolater, the auspicious nature of Abraham's birth, his conflict with an idolatry and (hence the king), and the king's attempt to kill him. Also familiar to many readers, thanks to Josephus, would have been Abraham's role of teacher of astronomy to the Egyptians. We will explore further the connection between Abraham and Egypt as we turn to the hermetic literature in the next section of this paper.

Abraham in the Alchemical Imagination

While the world of 19th century Bible reference works contains many interesting insights into Abraham, they by no means exhaust the depths of the tradition. Hermetic and alchemical works also discuss the Abraham figure. Both Quinn and Brooke have recently argued that we need to be looking to these sources to understand the roots of Mormon scripture and cosmology. Since the Book of Abraham is a text that is often perceived as a foundation stone in the edifice of Mormon cosmology (and rightly so), it is odd that no one has offered an investigation of the alchemical Abraham, and the philosophy and ideas that he is associated with. Once we have examined some of these texts and their world-view we will be in a better position to assess claims of borrowing, particularly with regards to the "New and Everlasting Covenant," an institution to which Abraham is closely tied.22 While there are some important parallels with the Book of Abraham running throughout this section, what is key to note are those similarities to the 'esoteric' Abraham of D&C 132 and its doctrine of deification through spiritual marriage. Also present are some discussions of lost texts that might be of interest to students of the Book of Mormon.

In 1612 a book by the title of Nicolas Flamel's Exposition on the Hieroglyphical Figures which he caused to be painted upon an Arch in St. Innocents church yard, was first published in Paris.23 This work related how an individual by the name of Flamel accomplished the alchemical "Great Work" after finding and translating a mysterious "Book of Abraham the Jew" (often referred to simply as the Book of Abraham). The book was a commercial success and was reprinted in a second French edition almost immediately. As the reputation of the work spread throughout a Europe hungry for printed alchemical texts it was translated into both German and English (1st edition in 1624).24

Though it introduced few if any really new theoretical insights, this brief work had a substantial impact on the field of 17th century alchemy. Its commercial success was most probably due to its unique mix of "romanticized" medieval Catholic piety (harkening back to a simpler time), its strikingly original visual imagery, and intriguing story line.25 Due to these and other factor (like the fact that this illustrated work was coming out at the height of the craze for 'emblem books') Flamel's Expositions has had a more productive afterlife than virtually any other 17th century alchemical work.26 It has managed to stay in print on and off throughout most of the last four hundred years up until the present day.27 While other alchemical works were slipping into obscurity in the eighteenth and early 19th centuries, heated debates were still taking place regarding the historicity of Flamel,28 and new works were being composed in his name.29 Indeed Flamel became a hero among the Rosicrucians who reprinted his purported works with their own introductions. His story of a found text (with Near Eastern links) leading to eternal life matched their own founding myth so well that Flamel has become their model of the perfect adept.30 Flamel was often referenced and quoted in both early and late compilations of alchemical and magical texts including the Magus, a valuable work for those interested in the magical world-view of the early 19th century.31

The French adept also made regular appearances in collected biographies of great alchemists and chemists up through the 19th century.32

While the entire Expositions is of great interest to students of alchemy and European literature more generally, we are mostly interested in the work's introductory chapter. Here Flamel describes the circumstances by which he discovered and ultimately deciphered the Book of Abraham, enabling him to successfully create the Philosophers Stone and transmute base metals three times.

Flamel, a copyist living in Paris in the mid 1300s, begins his story by relating how he came across an odd book that was both large and old in a local shop. The work was bound in "brasse" covers that were engraved in an unknown language.33 Likewise the book itself was partially written in an ancient eastern language that Flamel could not identify but compared to Hebrew or Greek at various points.34 In fact, the "secret" of the inscriptions turns out to be too good to keep and the author reveals that it was indeed written in Egyptian near the end of the work.35 Here he refers to the Book of Abraham simply as the "Booke of seven Egyptian seals."36

The pages themselves were written (actually inscribed) on an unconventional material that Flamel describes as possibly being tree bark. Since no one could understand the book the merchant was willing to sell the work to him for only two Florens. Flamel suspected the book might have been impounded from some unfortunate Jew before their most recent expulsion from France.

Though the majority of the work was unintelligible, Flamel was able to read the title page. Possibly we are meant to think of this as a later addition as it was a common medieval practice to add a Latin title page, or a table of contents, to works in Greek or Arabic that might otherwise be inaccessible. It began:

|0Abraham_the_Jew Abraham the Jew
Prince, Priest, Levite, Astrologer, and Philosopher37 to the Nation of the Jews,
By the wrath of GOD dispersed among the Guales, Sendeth Health.38
Flamel also learned that this Abraham lived at a time before the "Messiah" and looked forward to his coming.\textsuperscript{39} Abraham warned his readers against idolatry, the greatest 'vice.' Anticipating that the Jews would be forced to pay tribute to their captors (the Romans Emperors are specifically referenced in the text) he revealed the secret of transmutation so that they would be able to bear their burdens. The title page concluded by pronouncing curses (through a fairly typical Christian misuse of the word MARANTHA) on anyone who would read this work who was not a 'sacrificer' or 'scribe.'\textsuperscript{40}

Flamel apparently reasoned that since no 'sacrificers'\textsuperscript{41} were present (but he was a \textit{scribe}) the book must have come to him through an act of providence. As such he decided to read it without fear. Later retellings of the Flamel legend emphasized this 'providential' aspect of the story by adding elements to the narrative. They related how years earlier Flamel had been visited by an angel while in bed who showed him the mysterious book and promised him that at some time in the future it would be revealed to him and he would translate it for the world.\textsuperscript{42}

Flamel also notes for the reader that every few pages the \textit{Book of Abraham} contained a 'hierogliphicall' picture that illustrated some aspect of the allegorical process described in the text. The introduction describes these pictures in great detail and later publishers and artists took delight in rendering them into complex prints. However the original French (1612) and English (1624) publications only discussed them.\textsuperscript{43}

In my opinion this illustration refers to the process of \textit{putrefactio}, in which the ingredients of the transmutation are heated in crucibles till their 'deaths.' In alchemical terms the death of a substance comes when it loses its distinctive properties, such as form, color, smell, and state. This process is usually described in violent terms such as the end of the world, the beheading of a black crow, or the poising and explosion of a black toad (see figure 2).\textsuperscript{45}

The bathing figures in the background foreshadow the process of \textit{ablation} (a type of resurrection) where the elements are dissolved, cleansed (through the process of repeated distillations) and "whitened" (the penultimate color transformation in the 'great work'). The tub (or baptismal font) the figures are baking in represents the flasks in which this liquid stage of the work happens. The blood of the infants may well refer to the 'purified' or 'alchemical' mercury to be recombined with the other elements at this point. This "chemical marriage" turns the resulting 'stone' red like the blood (traditionally the last color transformation before completion.)

Ironically not all parts of the \textit{Book of Abraham} were this arcane. One section of the text (actually the final two thirds of the book) was written in clear Latin. It apparently related quite concrete discussions about how the Philosopher's stone was used or 'multiplied' after it was created.\textsuperscript{46}
Yet this section of the book is sealed and Flamel is forbidden to reveal anything about it to his readers for fear of the wrath of God.47

The rest of the book, which can be discussed, proves more problematic on linguistic grounds. Flamel could not read the arcane inscriptions or decipher the meaning of the pictures. He tried to show some of the figures and characters to other supposedly learned individuals but they could not translate the material and mocked him when they discover its origin.48

Eventually Flamel decided that the book could only be deciphered with the learning of the Jews so he sets off for Spain to find a Rabbi who could instruct him in the mysteries of 'Cabala.' On the return trip he met a converted Jewish alchemist and physician who partially instructed Flamel on the book's meaning, but then died during the voyage back to France. Flamel and his wife were forced to decipher the remaining strange figures for themselves, and after some time were able to transmute base metals into Gold three times.

Flamel and 'Perrenelle' went on to endow many churches and public institutions, and commissioned a painted arch for the St. Innocents Church-yard in Paris. Flamel claims that this arch contained a commentary on the alchemical process encoded in its outwardly pious symbolism.49 A copy of the painting on the Arch is included in the work itself and the remaining chapters of Flamel's Expositions provide commentary on it rather than the Book of Abraham.

So to recap briefly, in Flamel's Expositions we learn of a Book of Abraham the Jew written at least partially in Egyptian, with mystical or allegorical pictures distributed throughout. It is implied that the author of the book may have lived both before the birth of Christ and the Roman occupation of Israel. He was renown as a priest. The title page lists roles associated with the priesthood no less than three times (Priest, Levite and Sacrifice). This Abraham is also as a master of the stars and is a declared foe of idolatry. The special knowledge given to this author and transmitted through the Egyptian language is intended to bless God's chosen people in future generations. Yet through an act of grace the ultimate recipient of this text is a gentile who is mocked by the learned who cannot read the book. Years before an angel had revealed to Flamel that he would receive this book and would translate it. This story was very successful and has influenced hermetic literature up till the present day.

Clearly there are enough interesting parallels in this work to justify our interest in it. Yet before we go on its necessary to investigate in further detail exactly who this 'Abraham the Jew' was. Unfortunately my initial survey of the academic literature indicates that this question has not been sufficiently addresses. There are two common theories of Abraham's origins. Some authors see Abraham as an ancient and mythical adept whom the narrative seeks to set in the hey-day of Egyptian alchemy (Ptolemaic-Roman period) after the Diaspora.50

This would make Abraham a contemporary of such other illustrious characters as Maria the Jewess. The theory has the advantage of historical plausibility on its side. If one wished to create an ancient but respected Jewish alchemist this would certainly be a plausible time and place to set him. It also seems to be consistent with the assertion that Abraham was both a 'Levite,' and the need to pay tribute to 'Rome.'

Recently, however, in the important work The Jewish Alchemists, Raphael Patai has argued that Abraham the Jew was not simply a literary creation, but was a historic adept (or was at least a shadow of one), who lived in 14th century Spain. While Patai makes real contributions to our understanding of a little appreciated aspect of alchemical history, his conclusions on this issue seem to be seriously biased by his over-arching research goal. In The Jewish Alchemists he wishes to show that there was a substantial body of Jewish adepts in the Middle Ages who constituted a unique school of thought. This conclusion, in fact, is not strongly supported by the data.\textsuperscript{51} Patai's forced reading of Abraham's identity appears to be an attempt to prop up his findings.

Besides misreading a number of details on the title page,\textsuperscript{52} Patai makes the controversial claim that not only Abraham the Jew, but also Flamel, was a real 14th century alchemists (or at least 14th century traditions). Yet as Dixon conclusively demonstrates neither of these assertions are possible.

To begin with there are no references to either Nicolas Flamel or the Book of Abraham in the alchemical literature before the early years of the 17th century when the Expositions was originally published in Paris. None of the major early catalogs of alchemical texts or authors know of Flamel, let alone Abraham the Jew. While someone named Flamel did indeed live and work as a scribe in Paris in the 14th century, the alchemical myth was apparently not attached to him until hundreds of years after his death. Patai points to the many finely colored hand copied manuscripts of Flamel's works, and the fanciful reconstructions of the Book of Abraham, as proof of the antiquity of the tradition. Yet our previous discussion (see note 27) has already demonstrated that all of these manuscripts post-date the 1612 French first edition. Therefore they cannot be used to establish textual dependence.

Finally, Patai's most confused assertion is that the 1735 work Uraltes Chymisches Werk\textsuperscript{53} preserves the original manuscript of the Book of Abraham.\textsuperscript{54}

It is obvious from the first inspection that both Werk and Expositions are related through textual dependence. What Patai mistakes is the nature and direction of the dependence.

This later work makes multiple interesting additions to Abraham's character. For instance, to his list of titles (otherwise the same as Flamel's) it adds the new appellation, "born of the stock of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Judah" in an apparent effort to clear up exactly what his relationship to the Patriarch was.\textsuperscript{55} This statement certainly goes along way towards making "Abraham Eliezer" a contemporary figure, in contrast to Abraham the Jew's elusive, almost timeless, quality.

In contrast to Flamel's admiration of Abraham the Jew, the later Werk makes Abraham Eleazer the proto-typical "bad Jew." The title page of this work informs us that his alchemical knowledge comes not as a gift from God to his chosen people, but from a tablet inscribed by Master Tubal-Cain (descendant of Cain) that Abraham Eleazer somehow acquired. Immediately the entire context of the hermetic discussion takes on a sinister tone. The work draws on such stock anti-Semitic forms as the Jew's impious wait for a false messiah, plans to overthrow and destroy the Christian kingdoms at the end of the world, and even the guilt of Jews for having caused the Black Death by poising the Christian's wells. Given the rank anti-Semitic nature and structure of this work (which is a great departure from Flamel's earlier effort) its amazing Patai can claim that "It is likely, all in all, that Abraham Eliezer's Uraltes Chymisches Werk goes back to a fourteenth-century original written by a Jewish alchemist" (emphasis added.)
Patai also claims that since Flamel offers only a description of the Book of Abraham, but Werk claims to advance the whole thing, we must accept the longer and later text as prior. He finds it inconceivable that the longer text could be imagined from the brief descriptions provided in the Expositions. Yet it is odd that if this longer text existed, and was as wide-spread as Patai repeatedly claims, it was never once cited by any individual in the hermetic literature in over 300 years. Nor was its author or redactor ever mentioned. Further none of its strikingly unique images and symbols, such as the snake swallowing the virgin on leaf 7, were ever discussed or adopted by the broader literature.

In fact, students of textual analysis will be aware that when comparing two manuscripts, one with a difficult and short reading, and another with a quite long and clear explanation, the longer text is almost always a latter of the two. Such documents are usually scribal efforts to elucidate the received text. It is by this process that obscure biblical passages spawn expansive Midrash and biblical legends.\(^56\) Surely Patai is familiar with this process form his previous distinguished scholarship in the area of ancient Jewish religion. It is unfortunate that he neglected to apply these same common sense principals of textual dependence to his discussion of the Jewish alchemists.

In the final analysis we must conclude that Werk is a late effort attempting to capitalize on the revival of Flamel's popularity in the 18th century by claiming to reveal even greater mysteries marketed with a popular brand of anti-Semitism. Thus Flamel's righteous and wise Abraham was transformed into Abraham Eleazar, a both proximate and threatening character. In reality the Book of Abraham and Flamel (in his current alchemical form) are both unique literary creations of the 1612 edition of the Expositions.

So if Abraham the Jew was a new character, how were early audiences likely to understand him? I posit that they were likely to associate him quite strongly with the only other Abraham that had played a substantial role in the alchemy literature up till that point, and that was Abraham the Patriarch.\(^57\) Any biblically literate reader would immediately see the connection between the two characters in their association with Egypt. All of the biblical patriarchs were considered to be great adepts by alchemists wishing to dignify their art and Abraham was rarely left off the list.\(^58\) Those that had read Josephus or were at least familiar with the astrological lore of the day were likely to also see astrological connections between the two characters.

Indeed astrology is another aspect of the hermetic literature, rich in references to Abraham, which deserves to be discussed in greater length than the current project will allow. Traditions associating Abraham with astrology are very ancient and were apparently transmitted into medieval and early modern Europe through the works of Josephus. The important early natural philosopher and magical writer Henry Cornelius Agrippa (1486-1535), whose works had so much impact on the subsequent development of the field, was aware of these traditions. He mentions Abraham in conjunction with astrological knowledge frequently in his work.

Agrippa also goes on to relate a one point that there was a group of wizards, whom he refers to as 'Goetia' (necromancers), who had many lost books including those attributed to Adam, Abel, Enoch and Abraham among others. Tyson equates this Book of Abraham with the one cited several times by Firmicus Maternus in his Mathesis (discussed in Thorndike, 1:53).\(^59\)
Thorndike, the eminent 20th century historian of magic, is also aware of the early modern myth that Abraham was a great astrologer and had instructed Zoroaster in the stars.60

Also suggestive were traditions that related Abraham's key role in bringing the Great Work to the Jewish people. Some alchemists (including ones in the 19th century) pointed to the statement in Genesis 13:2 that Abraham was "very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold" as sufficient proof that he was a master adept. They went on to reason that he must have learned this art from the great Hermes while waiting out the famine in Egypt.61

Also available in both the 17th and 19th centuries was a variant on the Hermes myth that claimed the Emerald Tablet (the Bible of western Alchemy) was recovered from Hermes' tomb not by Alexander the Great, as the conventional wisdom held, but by Abraham and Sarah. Patai points out that this legend was included in Albert Fabricus' Bibliotheca Graeca. Here in a nicely condensed form we read:

The tabula smaragdina [Emerald Tablets], of great authority among the chemists, which, it is said, was discovered by Sarah the wife of Abraham, as Christophorus Kriegsman does not hesitate to affirm in the aforementioned *tabula smaragdine*62 in the valley of Hebron, in a tomb and in the hands of the cadaver of Hermes, contains in obscure words (as is the wont of chemists, to give much smoke and little light) everything, as they say, of the basis of performing the chemical magisterium of the metals, and the method of compounding a certain universal medicine [the elixir of life], but most generally described.63

It is interesting that Nicolas and Perrenelle, the 17th century's premier (and to my knowledge only) alchemical couple should be thematically linked to Abraham and Sarah, the only other well known alchemical couple. In both of these stories the wives play important roles. Perrenelle takes an active interest in the figures and process of transmutation, while Sarah is the one to actually recover the secret from the tomb. Both of these couple achieved long life (traditionally attributed to the Elixir of Life) and, according to the later Rosecrucians, Flamel and Perrenelle achieved immortality. Given the vast quantity of marriage symbolism in alchemical literature (e.g., the chemical wedding, conjunction, coniunctio) it is hard to believe that this is all a mere coincidence. Most likely the association of Abraham and Sarah with Flamel and Perrenelle was quite deliberate.

Indeed the 'chemical wedding' is a major transformation in the alchemical process that ultimately leads to the 'perfection' of the base metal and the adept. This perfection was often imagined in terms of the eternal life Adam enjoyed in the garden prior to the fall. By the 17th century this process was being viewed in ever more mystical terms with increased focus on the resulting 'universal medicine' or 'elixir of life.' Some of the symbols that came to be associated with this process, such as the compass and square, would have important afterlives in both Masonry and Mormonism (see figures 3-5).

In a similar vein the 132 Section of the Doctrine and Covenants explicitly and repeatedly links Abraham to a spiritualized order of marriage that would ultimately result in the eternal life and deification of its adherents. John Brooke has drawn many parallels between Mormon beliefs and Alchemical imagery. He points to the Pimander, which states that only through a "marriage" of the opposite principals of Mercury (the Sun King) and Sulfur (the Moon Queen) could the base metal (and the alchemist), regain the perfection of Adam in the Garden. See figure 6 for a good depiction of the chemical wedding drawing on garden imagery.

Indeed the restoration of this 'perfection' (in either the subject or the adept) is the central goal of all alchemical endeavors. Certainly there appears to be parallels in belief and imagery here, not least of which being the empowered philosophy that claims it is possible for individuals, through their actions and initiatives, to move back up Jacob's ladder. This stands in stark contrast to the more common contemporaneous Calvinist view of the universe that, in putting all power in God's hands, took all ability out of mans.

Brooke and others have pointed to this and other parallels as evidence for borrowing from hermetic or magical currents in the formation of Mormon scripture and cosmology. However there are a number of flaws in both Brooke's analysis of alchemy and his portrayal of Mormon cosmology that undercut the overall value of his book. While this is not the time to engage in a full refutation of this work, it may be possible to deal with a few issues surrounding Abraham and spiritualized concepts of marriage.

In so doing I hope to advance a method by which other cases of supposed hermetic influences can be assessed.

LDS scholars have traditionally offered two main defenses against Brooke's assertions. Bushman has pointed out that there is a severe problem of textual dependence throughout his work. As he demonstrates, it is not at all necessary for Joseph to turn to the fringes of the radical reformation for his inspiration on plural marriage as its discussed frequently in the Old Testament, a book which he was known to have read. Further, almost all of the radical traditions that Brooke studies shared the same ultimate textual foundation as Mormonism, the Bible. Thus in many cases of supposed dependence, Bushman argues that what we really have is a case of both groups reading the same primary sources in roughly the same way. As the dictum states, correlation does not show causation.

Another popular tactic, particularly with reference to celestial marriage has been to assert, as Sunny Grames does, that:

"the essential difference between marriage in hermetic alchemy and Mormonism is that in alchemy, it is a metaphor and symbol for the resolution of any opposites that were the result of man's fall...In contrast, Joseph Smith's teachings on marriage were literal. Whether or not Joseph Smith was a prophet receiving ideas through revelation, he never intended his doctrine of marriage to be metaphorical."

Thus the assertion is often heard that what the alchemists did was allegorical (or mythic), but what we do is "real" (ritual). This dichotomy is of course immediately suspect as both myth and ritual are different aspects of symbols. Thus Brooke could immediately answer that both systems are essentially symbolic and "magical" pathways to perfection.

This area also requires some caution in that we don't actually have perfect knowledge of what alchemists' lives were like, or what they did or did not do at different points in time. Most of the works that they have left us are either recipe books or works of mystic speculation. Reconstructing a way of life from a recipe book is an inherently chancy venture.

One of the few alchemists who we do know a lot about (mostly from his copious diaries) is John Dee (1527-1608).

Dee was among the leading natural philosophers of his day and wrote important works on fields as diverse as mathematics, optics, cartography and alchemy. At the time his personal library was the largest single collection in all of England.

Dee, like many of his contemporaries believed that the end of the world was nearing. As this end approached, nature, which had taken part in the original fall, continued to become increasingly corrupted. Thus Dee, who was striving to "read the book of nature," was faced with an ever more damaged, confused and corrupted text. Eventually Dee decided that it was beyond the power of mere mortals to reconstruct the Book of Nature. So, in a series of now famous encounters, he and a variety of scryers (the most prominent of them being the alchemist Edward Kelly) used a "showstone" to contact a group of angels who subsequently revealed to Dee the "true Cabala", whereby Dee could read the corrupted book of nature, and the "alchemy of Adam" allowing Dee to restore nature to its pre-fall state.

The relationship between Dee and Kelly was often tense. While Dee's primary interest lay in his angel conversations (he saw alchemy in terms of his role as a student of natural history), Kelly was drawn by the pursuit of royal patronage in the court of Rudolf II and the more mundane aspects of the art. Eventually tensions built with Kelly stating that he was going to leave to perfect his research, while at the same time Dee was being drawn deep into his search to restore Adam's "true" alchemy.

At this moment of maximum tension the angels revealed to Dee and Kelly that if they were to be successful in their alchemical endeavors they would have to enter into a covenant to share all property in common, including their marriage bonds. Scholars have doubted as to whether or not this agreement was actually ever acted upon, but Harkness argues that a pointed entry in Dee's diary reading "Pactum Factum" indicates that the agreement was physically consummated.

Another Alchemist who left a well-documented life history was Elias Ashmole. Ashmole was responsible for collecting many volumes from Dee's library as well as preserving many of his personal and 'angel' diaries. At one point in his investigation of alchemy Ashmole was "spiritually adopted" by a prominent adept named William Backhouse. While this adoption was relatively light on ritual (it apparently consisted of Backhouse formally asking Ashmole to think of himself as his son and to call him "father") it was never the less a seminal event in his life.

Backhouse, mistakenly believing himself to be on his deathbed, revealed to Ashmole his precious collection of accumulated insights and secrets. Yet even more important in Ashmole's opinion was the metaphysical change that took place in his very being as a result of this "adoption." Only at this point did he become a true adept. He believed he had been spiritually refined by the experience and could now go on to perfect the work. In an ode to Backhouse he wrote:

See how the power of your Adoption can Transmute imperfect Nature to be Man:
Nay with one word may yet refine it more,
Then all ye best digested Indian Oare.
These are of course only isolated examples that would be readily known to any student of English alchemy. A search of the historical record is likely to turn up more such examples. While neither event involved elaborate or elegant ritual, both were cases of a physical enactment of what is commonly thought of as a 'metaphor.' It is certainly difficult to argue that Dee's angelically inspired wife sharing was any less real than Joseph's polygamy. Thus while there may be a good deal of validity in Grames' basic criticism, the dimness of our knowledge in this area warrants caution, at least until a more complete investigation of the ritual aspects of the alchemical literature can be completed.

"Then shall they be Gods": A study in comparative cosmology.

In the mean time a new approach to the problem of establishing dependence is necessary. It must begin by being quite specific about what is really under investigation. According to the subtitle of Brooke's book he is interested in the nature of Mormon cosmology and its possible antecedents. We must take him at his word on this point.

What is then called for is a detailed study of the actual content of Mormon cosmology in comparison to the hermetic system. A full analysis of alchemical cosmology could be the topic of multiple fairly heavy volumes and the same is true for Mormonism. Both topics cry out for careful philosophical and theological treatment.

Unfortunately Brooke, a historian, offers us very little of this. Rather than a comparison of actual systems of ideas he focuses on finding explanation for the historical actions of certain individuals. Instead of formulating an accurate statement of what Mormon cosmology actually is, Brooke spends hundreds of pages investigating questions like whether Joseph Smith Sr. learned alchemical lore in the copper fields of his youth, or in what ways counterfeiting rings existed in a 'symbiotic' relationship with treasure seekers. This approach throws only a weak light on both Mormon and hermetic cosmology. It tends to do a better job of providing post-hoc justifications of historical actions, rather than exploring the actual content of the philosophical systems that drove the actions in the first place.

The parallels that Brooke illustrates require careful motif criticism. While it is obvious that there are many parallels between Mormon and alchemical texts, the question remains, are these parallels significant? Eliade has pointed out many interesting parallels between West African metal lore and European alchemical ideas, yet no one would posit a direct causal relationship between the two systems. The same goes for parallels between hermaphrodite imagery in alchemy and Aboriginal rituals and myths associated with the practice of subincision.

Jung, who has done more than any other single individual to revive interest in alchemy, has discussed how alchemical symbols are partly a product of the human subconscious. He has demonstrated at length how they can appear in individuals who have no connections to a hermetic past. His basic clinical observations on this point hold no matter what one thinks of his theories of the 'collective' subconscious. Mormon scholars looking for ancient parallels for the Book of Mormon have often been admonished to avoid resting their arguments on these sorts of spurious correlations. Those seeking to establish claims of causality through other sorts of parallels would also do well to heed these warnings.

The real issue that a comparison of the chemical wedding and celestial marriage raises is how we are to understand the ensuing 'perfection' or 'deification.' As Brooke notes above, the basic thrust of the alchemical approach is to combine opposite principals, separated at the fall, to restore Adam (whether understood as the alchemist or his metallic subject really makes no difference) to the state of perfection he enjoyed before the fall. The hermaphrodite symbolizes this outcome (see figure 3).

The process of combining opposite principals only helps to achieve perfection because most western alchemical systems (certainly those after the introduction of large amounts of Kabalistic theory in the 14th century) are predicated on a notion of creation ex deo (creation out of the substance of God) rather than creation ex nihlo (the standard view of the day). What this basically means is that a neo-Platonic god, existing outside the stream of time, emanated (usually ten) waves of his own being out into the void from which the metaphysical reality that surrounds us was created. The creation and fall are in this view simply part of a process of differentiation that resulted as the primal unity was shattered into sets of opposed opposites. 'Perfection' comes from assimilating the resulting opposites back into a state of fundamental unity with God.

Thus the alchemist realizes that in the grand scheme of things 'difference,' and even identity, is simply an illusion of time and process. Fundamentally all things are equally godlike and will return in time to that state of perfection and unity. Thus the great riddle, the alchemist strives to discover the 'first agent' in his quest to make the Philosophers Stone, yet this holy substance is in everything. Ignorant men spend their lives searching for that which is all around them. Other traditions relate how the sacred stone itself already exists in the head of the Black Toad, a creature that is venomous and a byword for corruption.

This is the metaphysical reality that underlies Maria the Jewess' famous dictums: "One is the All, and it is through it that the All is born. One is the All, and if the All does not contain all, the All will not be born." Also, "the Hebrew prophetess [ecstatically] shrieked, 'One becomes two, two becomes three, and by means of the third and fourth achieves unity; thus two are but one" (see figure 7).

This is a coherent system rich in transcendent meaning. It is empowering because it provides individuals with a way to understand God's creation and to seek unification with him. Indeed the successful alchemist achieves immortality not through dinking a magical potion, but through totally merging himself into that which is outside of time itself, the Ensof, or Endless, immovable and placid god of neo-Platonism. He does not age or decay precisely because he has taken himself out of the stream of causality through a process of joining opposite principals. In late alchemical thought the joining of all opposites represents nothing less than the end of history.

It should now be clear that the perfection we are commanded to seek in the 132 Section of the Doctrine and Covenants is a largely unrelated phenomenon. Unlike the alchemists we do not hold to a doctrine of creation ex deo. Rather the doctrine of creation outlined in the third chapter of the Book of Abraham makes the unique claim that all intelligences (spirits) are coeternal with God. Hence they are uncreated in some substantial sense.

This is a very different concept from the doctrine of 'preexistent' souls that Brooke repeatedly points to. Those souls were still created, but simply before the physical creation took place. The Mormon claim of uncreated intelligences, that are coeternal with God, is much more radical in its implications. Any 17th century alchemist would have found this statement blasphemous and very disturbing in that it cuts the legs out from under the very metaphysical system he is trying to manipulate.
Mormon assertions of the uncreated or eternal nature of matter only compound this problem from the alchemical point of view. If the basic elements or pairs of opposites are not the result of emanations from one God, it is not clear that they can be successfully combined, or what would even be achieved by doing so.\textsuperscript{80} In fact 2 Nephi 2:11 argues that not all pairs of opposites can be combined, indeed opposition in all things must be maintained. To break this law would threaten the metaphysical basis of all creation and divinity itself.

While alchemy stresses the essential unity of all matter and intelligence, Abraham 3:17 outlines a system of infinite, ontologically significant, gradations in exactly these substances. It is this 'necessary opposition' and 'difference' that is key to understanding Mormon cosmology. Rather than trying to return to an idyllic unified past without individual identity, it attempts to create a certain system of difference that is advantageous to both God and his individual children. It then attempts to lock this 'difference' into place through the sealing power of the priesthood.

This entire process happens within the stream of time. Nor is it clear that it can ever be transcended. Thus in Mormon thought there is no end to history.

Because difference, and not unity, is endogenous to Mormon cosmology it faces a very different set of problems and issues than alchemy. Hence the ultimate aim of the 'New and Everlasting Covenant' is quite different from the 'chemical wedding.' The nature of 'perfection' or 'deification' imagined by the two systems is fundamentally irreconcilable.

Given the large number of ontological differences between these two systems (starting with Mormonism's rejection of the creation of intelligence or matter) it is not clear where substantively significant cosmological borrowing could have taken place.
Certainly the cosmological aspects of these two systems do not resemble each other, even at the most basic levels of generality. Thus a motif critical approach would lead us to reject Mormonism dependence on hermetic philosophy.

While Mormonism and alchemy certainly share some symbols and motifs, this correspondence does not demonstrate dependence. Some of these symbols, such as the inverted pentagrams, the 'all seeing eye,' and square and compass, became widely diffused throughout the English speaking world. As these sorts of symbols become widespread they acquire a plethora of new meanings and associations. This allows groups such as the fraternal societies and Mormons to use them in making new systems of meaning and correspondence. Certainly your average 17\textsuperscript{th} century alchemist would not be any happier with the cautious deism of London's Grand Lodge than he would be with Mormonism radical cosmology. All three of these systems relate their different understanding of the world in a largely shared symbolic language. It is this sharing of symbols that makes any communication possible. Yet the beliefs of none of these groups are reducible to their shared symbolic vocabulary.

Other correlations are likely the result of either Ruth Benedict's "arc of human potential" or the Jungian subconscious. Marriage is a big event in most people's lives. It is not surprising to see it being given quasi-mystical connotations in diverse religions and cultures. If one wishes to show the dependence of one tradition on another, it is necessary for the contents of the systems, as well as their constituent symbols, to be closely related. This is not the case with the celestial and chemical marriage.

Conclusion
This paper began by outlining eight aspects of the Book of Abraham that differ substantially from the Genesis narrative. Most of these themes or images have been attested (often in multiple places) in our study of contemporaneous Christian, Jewish and Hermetic views of Abraham. Many of these, such as the idea that Abraham was nearly sacrificed, only to be rescued and go on to teach astronomy to the Egyptians, were readily available in Joseph's environment. Others (like a Book of Abraham written in Egyptian which included pictures) were probably not immediately available to anyone in Joseph's circle, but had been discussed by other authors from the 17th century onward. When examined in this broader context it becomes clear that many aspects of the Mormon view of Abraham fit well within the totality of the literature, at least in terms of themes and motifs. In this regard the work is not as marginal to the religious discourse of its day as is commonly thought.

However, as our discussion of the alchemical Abraham has demonstrated, correlations in motifs or symbolism do not in fact indicate substantive dependence. Motif criticism, when applied to the underlying cosmologies of Mormonism and alchemical philosophy, indicates that the two systems are really quite different making substantial borrowing (as implied by Brooke) highly unlikely. Thus while the Book of Abraham is not necessarily unique in terms of its images, the cosmological view it helps to advance appears to have no antecedents in the literature reviewed for this paper. It is the content of this remarkable work, rather than its form, that sets it apart. In this respect the Mormon view of Abraham constitutes an important original contribution to the wider theological discussion.

Appendix 1: Survey of 19th century reference works.
The brief survey of 19th century reference works discussed in the paper was conducted on a sample of 10 Bible dictionaries, encyclopedias or commentaries. Each of these was representative of contemporaneous Protestant thought and relatively easily available to the general researcher interested in replicating these results. I avoided sources that were rare or only available in specialized collections and focused instead on works that might be found in the stacks of any university library. Many of these sources date to before the publication of the Book of Abraham, with the rest distributed throughout the remainder of the century. The aim of this survey is to illustrate some general tendencies in the literature and to demonstrate the sorts of things that were available. The following texts were reviewed:

A. Alexander, Archibald, 1772-1851. 1830. A pocket dictionary of the Holy Bible: containing a historical and geographical account of the persons and places mentioned in the Old and New Testaments: and also a description of other objects, natural, artificial, civil, religious, and military, together with a copious reference to texts of Scripture under each important word/ prepared for the American S.S. Union, and adapted to general use by Archibald Alexander; revised by the Committee of publication. Philadelphia: American Sunday School Union, 1830.

C. Brown, John. 1833. A Dictionary of the Holy Bible. Containing an historical account of the persons; a geographical and historical account of the places; a literal, critical, and systematical description of other Objects, whether natural, artificial, civil, religious or military. New York: J. & J. Harper. *

G. Daubuz, Charles. (1673-1717). 1842. A symbolic dictionary: in which, agreeably to the nature and principals of the symbolical character and language of the eastern nations in the first ages of the world, the general signification of the prophetic symbols, especially those of the Apocalypse, is laid down and proved from the most ancient authorities, sacred and profane. London: J. Nesbit & Co. *

* Entries tend to recap the Genesis narrative without introducing new material.

These texts were searched for the following terms, as suggested by the 'Archive of Restoration Culture' coding guide-lines:

Abraham
Ur
Egypt
Astronomy
Kolob
Priesthood (from the fathers)
False Priests
To this list I also added the terms:
Abrahamic Covenant
Astrology
Egypt
Urim and Thummim

13 The Nimrod Cycle includes a variety of stories and related traditions that describe Abraham's birth under auspicious astrological signs, the miraculous circumstances of his upbringing, his discovery of the one true God, his private war against idolatry and finally an ill fated attempt by a king to sacrifice him on some sort of huge fiery altar. Occasionally the stories end with the king acknowledging the authority of Abraham and being forced to confess the one true God. Readers will mostly likely be familiar with these themes through the Book of Jasher, though it is by no means the only place where the stories are found. Early translations of the same stories were also available through Muslim traditions, which faithfully preserved the underlying Jewish materials. 15 It is interesting to speculate on what the authors source for this story was as he lists none in his entry. It is hard to tell from such an abbreviated version, but the possibility must be considered that it was the Seder Haddoroth, or Order of the Historical Ages that formed the basis of many of these accounts, rather than the Sefer ha-yashar. This speculative judgment is based on the order of events and relative sparseness of the narrative, but its probably not possible to offer a definitive answer on this point.

17 Note for instance an 1835 letter from Oliver Cowdrey to William Frye (reprinted in the Messenger and Advocate in December 1835) in which he repeatedly makes references to Josephus in his description of the contents of the papyrus, particularly with reference to what records Abraham might have had from the fathers dealing with astronomy:Enoch's Pillars, as mentioned by Josephus, is upon the same roll.-True, our present version of the Bible does not mention this fact, though it speaks of the righteousness of Abel and the holiness of Enoch,--one slain because his offering was accepted of the Lord, and the other Taken to the regions of everlasting day without being confined to the narrow limits of the tomb, or tasting death, but Josephus says that the descendents of Seth were virtuous, and possessed a great knowledge of the heavenly bodies, and, that, in consequence of the prophecy of Adam, that the world should be destroyed once by water and again by fire, Enoch wrote an account of the history of the same and put into two pillars one of brick and the other of stone; and that the same were in being at his (Josephus') day.

25 25 This last characteristic is a feature not shared by most alchemical texts, which often read rather like a cookbook where the recipes are composed of a series of riddles-occasionally in verse form!

26 26 For a good conscience textual history of the Expositions see Dixion, Laurinda.

27 27 Indeed Flamel is now better known than ever after having been prominently featured in J.K. Rowling's highly successful novel, Harry Potter and 29 29 Both Flamel and his Book of Abraham turned out to be popular enough to generate a flood of imitators. Some works such as Uraltes chymisches Werk (Lipzig 1760) claimed to be the original Book of Abraham the Jew (or in this case Abraham Elielzer), which Flamel had worked from. Others volumes, like the popular Testament of Nicholas Flamel (London: J. and E. Hodson. 1806), purported to be additional lost works by the French master. Dixon points out that during this period interested parties continued to copy by hand illustrated manuscripts of the Expositions and speculative reconstructions of the Book of Abraham. This was often necessary to capture in the illustrations the subtleties of color described in the text, which were in turn descriptions of the temperatures or appearances of different chemicals in the laboratory. These details could not be accurately reproduced in the mass marketed books of the time. All of these manuscripts date from after the printing of the Flamel works (p. xli) contrary to the repeated implications of Patai. (See Patai, Raphael. 1994. The Jewish Alchemists: A History and Source Book. Princeton: Princeton University Press. pp. 218-238)

30 Dixon reports that in 1889 a reprint of the first English edition was issued with an enlarged preface by the prominent Rosicrucian W.W. Westcott. (p. xlv.)

31 For an example of an early compilation of alchemical texts that includes quotes by Flamel (encyclopedic compilations of quotes became a popular form in the alchemical book trade of the mid 17th century) see: Dee, Arthur. 1650. *Fasciculus Chemicus: or Chemical Collections, expressing the ingress, progress and egress of the secret hermetic science out of the choice and most famous Authors. For an example of a later collection that also refers to Flamel in glowing terms see: Barrett, Francis. 1801. The Magus or Celestial Intelligencer; being a complete system of Occult Philosophy. London: Printed for Lackington, Allen, and Co., Temple of the Muses, Finsbury Square. See especially the discussion page 59 (Citadel Press, 1967 reprint edition), though Flamel is referenced in multiple other places as well. Interestingly enough I can find no place where Barrett mentions the Book of Abraham in his text, though it is mentioned in the Testament published just a few years later.

33 Dixon, 7.

34 It is unlikely that script in the story is meant to be either Greek or Hebrew as a trained copyist and notary who spent considerable time studying the mysteries of the Jews (Cabala) would be expected to be somewhat familiar with these languages.

35 Dixon, 40

36 This attribution is not as surprising as it would at first appear as Hermes the Thrice Blessed, the patron saint of all European and Near Eastern schools of alchemy (and reputed author of the 'Emerald Tablets'), was known to be Egyptian. It would seem that Abraham's sojourn in Egypt and familiarity with Egyptian wisdom (according to Josephus he taught the Egyptians astrology) would make him an ideal character to transfer this wisdom to God's chosen people. For a basic discussion of the role of Hermes in Alchemy see Grames, Sunny. 1997-1999 Fools Gold: The Hermetic Explanation of Celestial Marriage. Archive of Restoration Culture. Provo, UT: Joseph Fielding Smith Institute. It should also be noted that both the alchemical and emblem book literatures showed a considerable interest in Egyptian subjects at this point in time. See for instance: Maier, Michael (1568-1622). 1614. Arcana arcanissima hoc est Hieroglyphica Aegyptio-Grica, vulgo necdum cognita, ad demonstrandum falsorum apud antiquos deorum, dearum, heroum, animantium & institutorum pro sacris receptorum, originem... sex libris exposita. 4 [Oppenheim? London: Thomas Creede]_____________________. 1625. De hieroglyphicis aegyptiorum. n.p. :

Societatem Londoniensis

37 In this context the term 'Philosopher' refers to Abraham's role as master of 'natural philosophy', a discipline that in the 17th century included mathematics, astrology and alchemy.

38 The issue of how the identity of this particular Abraham is to be understood will be taken up in the next section.

39 Patai and others interpret this as the referring to the medieval Jewish Messiah. Yet it seems unlikely that Flamel as a good Christian could have had such a positive attitude towards Abraham if he believed that he was waiting for a figure that most of Europe would have considered akin to the anti-Christ. This is also inconsistent with the description of Abraham as 'prince,' a title ill suited to fate of the Jewish people in 14th century France (or Guale).

40 For a discussion of this term and its original meaning see Patai, 219.

41 The text does at multiple point equate Rabbis with 'priests' but not with 'sacrificers.' For instance on page 11 we read of some Jewish Priest, in some Synagogue of Spaine: 'Sacrificer' may refer to the old temple priesthood, or it may have some other meaning.

42 This aspect of the Flamel myth, which is not related in the Expositions, has become quite wide spread. While I have yet to locate the first printed instance of this story, I suspect that it arises out of one of the many biographies of Flamel that were circulating in French circles. The first mention of the myth that I have been able to locate in English is in Wait's Lives of the Alchemystical Philosophers.

46 46 My conjecture on this point is based on the fact the last of the illustrations in this section, mentioned in passing in the introduction, shows a desert with many snakes and a river in it. This combination of heat and moisture was thought necessary for snakes to breed. This process of multiplication was thought also to apply to the stone and ultimately be the way in which gold or other stones were produced. As Flamel is reputed to have stated in another work:In our Stone, there are the Sun, and the Moon vive, and they generate other Suns and other Moons; other Gold and Silver, to these, are dead [cannot multiply themselves]. Dee, Fasciculus Chemicus p.26 (see figure 1)

48 48 I shewed [characters form the book] to the greatest Clerkes in Paris, who understood thereof no more than myselfe; I told them they were found in a Booke that taught the philosopher's stone, but the greatest part of them made a mocke of both me, and of that blessed Stone (Dixon, 10).

49 49 The arch is no longer extant but it stood until 1742 when it was destroyed in revolutionary violence. According to Dixion while the imagery described by Flamel is basically consistent with orthodox views there are multiple small details that the average religious observer of the day would note as being odd. Paul is not placed on the left side of Christ, and the sponsors of the work are shown begging for mercy in orange robes, instead of being naked as convention would dictate. It is also not immediately how the monsters in the painting relate to the traditional symbols of the four evangelists. (Dixion xvi, xxxv-xl). However Villain has presented strong arguments that there is little remarkable about the imagery in the arch.

51 51 In my opinion Patai does show that there were substantial numbers of Jewish alchemists, and that they made contributions to the art, especially through Kabbalah. What he fails to show is that there was a uniquely Jewish approach to alchemy. Rather Jewish philosophers seemed to be integrated into the dominant systems of their day.

52 52 For instance Patai claims that the reference to Roman Empire really means 'Holy Roman empire' even though the text itself does not claim this. Also Flamel's positive attitude towards Abraham's anticipation of the Messiah would be rather hard for a 14th century French Christian to explain. This fact alone would seem to indicate that we are to understand that Abraham lived before the start of the common era. See: Patai 220.

See the introductory essay of Kugel for a current discussion of this process.

Another possibility that may be fruitful, but cannot be pursued in the current paper, is a more complex 'compound' theory of identity. For instance, Patai provides one of the best discussions of Maria the Jewess available anywhere in the literature (60-95). It suffers from few of the problems that distort some of his later findings. In this discussion he notes a number of ways in which Maria was simultaneously identified and misidentified. At one point this historical character from the Common Era became associated with Maria the sister of Moses/Aaron in the Torah for complex reasons that probably revolve around attempts to validate her reputation. This interpretive step was taken even though other writers knew her as a near contemporaneous adept. I would posit a similar process of compound identity formation might be at work with Abraham the Jew. In this more complicated context it is still valid to speak of these traditions as being those of Patriarch as this was the association that the author was trying to elicit from his readers.

For instance, Patai notes that Abraham, along with other patriarchs, was occasionally conflated with Hermes (33). More usually the Patriarchs, including Abraham, were viewed as having received this knowledge from God (Patai 36). Often the gift of the practice of Alchemy is explicitly restricted to the literal seed of Abraham. Maria the Jewess in particular has multiple statements to this effect, though we also saw the idea quite strongly implied in Flamel's Expositions. Do not touch the philosophers stone with your hands; you are not of our race, you are not of the race of Abraham. See St. Mark MS, f. 178; MS 2,327, f. 214; MS 2,250 f. 163 as quoted in Patai, 70.

69 Many individuals including Dee were particularly concerned about a great conjunction that was due to occur in 1588. (Clulee 222-3).

73 Motif criticism is the comparative analysis of the development of theological or philosophical ideas in a set of documents. Scholars generally employ this technique to discover clues about the authorship or origins of a given text. Unlike form critical analysis, which focuses on grammatical and structural details, motif criticism examines themes and ideas, such as the evolution of the Son of Man between the Book of Daniel and the New Testament.

80 It is interesting to note at this point that the chemical wedding is usually described in terms of alloying two pieces of metal, where both are totally destroyed to create a third substance. The combination of opposites here is complete. While Joseph does occasionally apply metallurgical language to the idea of celestial marriage his preferred term seems to have been weld. Here both pieces of metal retain their essential characteristics and identity. While joined together they are not combined. This is a metaphor that has no immediate antecedents in alchemical lore.

Nature of Source: One of the various Universalist newspapers of the periods. Rather than dealing extensively with national issues the Evangelical Magazine in its early period seems to mostly concern itself with the growth and affairs of congregations locally and in New York state. The tone of the journal is often contentious and partisan with the editor rehashing disputes with local clergy. The newspapers, published weekly, had long articles, (often recounting some individuals past success in establishing a congregation and reviewing its growth over the years), essays on doctrinal topics (less frequently), letters to the editor, poetry and notices of personal interest (both obituaries and weddings).
Comment: In this letter to the editor an anonymous reader recounts a local conflict with a regional Presbyterian priest over the salvation and ultimate fate of infants who die before being able to accept the gospel. The author argues against judgment of infants as either moral agents (which they are not yet) or based on their future destiny (known to God).
Researcher: Benjamin N. Judkins
Excerpt (pages): "Is the future destiny of infants suspended on their present character? Or is it suspended on the character of their creator? The latter, we should say-and yet our priests tell about totally depraved infants-soverign grace-agency of infants-subjects of rewards and punishments, all in the same breath!"

Comment: This article comments upon the last few weeks of a recent revival in Utica. The author claims that the affair has been in large part unsuccessful because of the negative reputation of such undertakings with the general population. Like early Latter-day Saints Universalists frowned upon revivals. However the motivating bias in their case seems to be an extreme distaste for the Calvinist doctrines of election, justification and eternal damnation that underlie the central psychology of revival conversions (which begins with a realization of ones own "damned state"). Like Mormon commentators this article also objects that revival conversions tend to play on emotional insecurities and be short term in duration.

Comment: This brief essay notes the growth in the idea of "free agency" in current discourse. The doctrine of free agency is defined against "necessity." The author argues against the existence of free agency as it contradicts God's ability to order every detail of history and to reveal his will through prophecy. The concluding comments imply that man's lack of agency in a Universalist framework stems from his origin as a "created" being, prepared specifically to return to the Father. The contrasting cosmology advanced in the Book of Abraham (focused on the eternal nature of intelligence) leads to exactly the opposite conclusion regarding the necessity and nature of agency.

Modern theologians will have it that men may do contrary to what God foresees, purposes and predicts that they will do. The doctrine of free agency is opposed to necessity, the sovereignty and government of God. God meant that Joseph should dream his dream and relate them to his father, mother and brethren. Comment: This article starts a series of lectures published roughly weekly or bi-weekly in the paper on topics regarding ancient Jewish history up till the time of the New Testament. In the first article the author presents a descriptive tour of the nation of Israel and invites the reader to follow along on a map. He begins in the south by the Egyptian border and works his way north till he comes to Nazareth. Noting Christ's birth he then follows his ministry's movement south to Jerusalem. The geography section of the article finishes with a description of the area of Christ's tomb and the graveyards to the south of the city. Thus the procession of physical geography presented by the author is yoked to the idea of religious progress culminating (and terminating) in Christ.

The author often points out the desolate nature of the land and equates it with God's curse on an essentially unrighteous people, often citing biblical precedent. This article does not seem to imply any immediate restorations agenda, and places a great deal of distance between Israel and the reader. The Holy Land is enshrined in pious memory, but plays little current role in the present.

Comment: This discourse continues Rev. Barry's lecture on the theme of Hebrew constitutional government. He begins with a discussion of the social contract between people and sovereign (in this case God) which lies at the heart of their constitution. He then goes on to defend the God given and wise character of the Law of Moses. This is mostly accomplished by demonstrating the necessity of strict laws and punishments given the "coarseness" of the Jewish people and the depravity of the world they lived in. Strict physical punishment were needed as spiritual injunctions as used with the gospel would "have but little or no effect" with this people. Due to the seriousness of the threat of idolatry and the weakness of the Jews the author finds that God was correct to institute a strict law and that is no way contravened the universal rights of mankind.

Throughout this article we see the author use of republican language to describe the Old Testament. He feels a need to defend the true republican virtues in the Old Testament, which the reader can only see if properly instructed. Again there is no immediate restorationist sentiment, or veneration for the Jews, in this article. Instead they are described as a tool for keeping God's light alive in the world (if only dimly) during a dark-age, and part of a plan to inaugurate the "new and perfect dispensation" of the gospel.
Throughout the article the author relies on Jewish Antiquities as his only stated source (besides the Bible).

Researcher: Benjamin N. Judkins

Excerpt (pages):
In responding to those who argue against the Law of Moses because God takes the Jews as his chosen people (as opposed to instituting a universal gospel) Barry states:
"In instituting special government among the Jews, God gave them a record of himself—a communication of his own wisdom and benevolence which when looked upon, led the mind to him from whence it came. He placed them too in the central part of the then inhabited globe, and continually surrounded them in displays of divine power, thus extending abroad the glory of his name, and lighting up, in some degree, the darkness of the surrounding world. In peace-and in war-in their own land and in the land of strangers-in their captivities and dispersions, the Jews put forth an influence, which told powerfully of the moral condition of mankind, and contributed, in no small degree, to prepare them for the introduction of the new and perfect dispensation."

Thus as Jewish government is really republican (if one knows how to read the Bible) their religion was also universal in outlook and preparatory to the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

In this article the author repeatedly applies republican constitutional theory to his description of ancient institutions. He appears to go so far as to declare that like the United States, Israel's government had a division of powers between three separate branches.

While Barry resists any impulse to 'Christianize' the Old Testament, he does modernize it in a number of other respects, most noticeably being his 'democratizing' of the past. One can only guess what he would have made of the Book of Mormon's "voice of the people."

"It appears from the Record, that the Hebrew constitution, had in good degree been framed by Moses, as dictated by the almighty himself...."

"In speaking more particularly relative to the general government of the Jews, we remark that "the organs of state are three-fold, via a popular assembly, an advising senate, and a presiding magistrate."

"The democratic assembly consisted at first, as is apparent from the Old Testament, of the whole Jewish body; but after their permanent establishment in the promised land, of representatives elected or chosen by the several tribes..."

Nature of Source: One of the various Universalist newspapers of the periods. Rather than dealing extensively with national issues the Evangelical Magazine seems to mostly concern itself with the growth and affairs of congregations locally and in New York state. The tone of the journal is often contentions and partisan with the editor rehashing disputes with local clergy. The newspapers, published weekly, had long articles, (often recounting some individuals past success in establishing a congregation and reviewing its growth over the years), essays on doctrinal topics, letters to the editor, poetry and notices of personal interest (both obituaries and weddings).
Comment: Barry proposes to begin a discussion of revelation between "God and the Hebrew people" in the current article. However, rather than discussing the activities of the prophets, or the Torah as the word and law of God, Barry launches directly into a discussion of the temple traditions and the vital role of the temple in receiving revelation. His discussion of the temple begins with a number of descriptions of both the tabernacle in the wilderness and the temple proper, culled from the Old Testament. He emphasizes the literal presence of God on the Mercy Seat and sees in this the primary means by which Israel received guidance. Barry then goes on to quote an un-cited Talmudic source relating the details of how the High-Priest obtained political oracles on behalf of the nation in the presence of multiple witnesses.

In his discussion of the temple there is no reference made to sacrifices or other period rituals, other than a passing remark on the "table" and "incense alter." Barry also explicitly denied the possibility of individuals receiving personal revelation in the temple. Reflecting his belief that God was the head of the Jewish state in fact as well as principal, he asserts that all revelation so received was communal and political/religious in content. In the conclusion of the article he further develops his ideas on the relationship between the law and the gospel.

Excerpt: "It also merits our notice, that the High Priest could neither consult, nor give answers whenever he pleased. He could not ask counsel of the oracle on private subjects or in a private manner. The law directed that the judge or chief magistrate should propose the question to the priest, and be with him when he consulted the oracle. The account which the Talmudists give of the matter seems to be founded in truth. 'The high-priest stood with his face toward the ark, or presented himself with his breastplate before the veil, exactly over against the mercy seat, where the divine presence rested; while the person who consulted the oracle stood behind him and said 'Shall I do this thing, or shall I not do it?' And when he presented himself in due manner, God answered him in the same manner as he did Moses, that is, by an audible voice from the Mercy Seat.' Josephus tells us that any person who thought fit, might be present when the oracle was consulted, in order to remove all suspicion of imposture, and to give satisfaction to strangers as well as Jews."

"We cheerfully acknowledge that the Hebrew economy is imperfect and faulty, when compared with the economy of grace; but it was perfect in its design and adaptation to the wants and condition of the people, during the period of its existence. The Law was designed for the infantile state of the human race-the Gospel for the more manly and enlightened age of the world.

Comment: After a hiatus Rev. Barry's column returns to the paper with a discussion of Jewish religious (rather than political) institutions. Barry begins with a general discussion of the Sabbath drawn on biblical precedent. He then introduces and explains six major yearly Sabbaths (or festivals) for the benefit of his reader. Here he turns to the secondary literature (Josephus, Vide Horne, Calmet) to illustrate his points. Barry also appears to have some knowledge of how Jewish communities in his own day observed these holidays, though its not entirely clear what the source of his information is.

Barry next turn his attention to sacrifices. He reviews three major types of sacrifices for his readers, burnt offerings, sin offerings and peace offerings. In dealing with this subject, as well as the previous, Barry displays a reasonable grasp of the material. At times there are paraphrases of material that resemble the Mishna, though this may be coming through Barry's secondary sources.

With regard to the origins of sacrifices, he postulates that they must have been revealed in the time of Adam (hence Cain and Able's sacrifices). Yet there is no hint that a symbolic doctrine of Jesus Christ was being taught or was understood by those to whom this practice was revealed (unlike in Moses 5:6-7). Rather, sacrifices were instituted because of the primitiveness of earlier people and Jews in particular. Overall, this article, as well as the others in the series provide an interesting bench-mark of the amount and sophistication of knowledge regarding ancient Jewish religious practices in the 1840s.

"The Passover having been prepared, according to divine command, was partaken of with bitter herbs, to remind them of the nature of the servitude from which they had been delivered."
"It cannot be questioned that scarifies obtained in the early ages of the world by the appointment of God. We find Cain and Able offering to the Most High the fruits of the earth and the firstlings of the flocks, in their worship of him. Scarifies seem to have been wisely adapted to man in his rude and uncultivated state, and even in later times-they were therefore made a part of the Jewish worship."

Comment: This article continues Rev. Barry's discussion of Jewish religious institutions. In it he advances a four part typology of the "officers of the Hebrew Church" consisting of 1. Priests, 2. Prophets 3. Scribes 4. Nazarites. Each of these groups is discussed in turn, with the lengthiest discussion being given to the priest. Barry identifies three orders of "priesthood" with the highest belonging to the high-priests. Special attention is given to traditions surrounding the description and function of priestly garments. The "breast plate of judgment" is described and associated with the Urim and Thummim. Barry makes multiple associations between the ordination to the priesthood and the giving of ritual clothing, and hypothesizes the same pattern when the Bible is silent on the issue.

The present article contains less republican rhetoric and places a smaller rhetorical distance between the reader and his ancient subjects than have previous articles in the series. Note, the text that was filmed for this article was marred and is difficult to read in places, particularly in the footnotes.

Excerpt:
"3. The breast plate of judgment, was an article of dress worn on the day of atonement: or when the oracle was consulted, and consisted of a piece of cloth one span square, having on it four rows of jewels, three in each, on which were engraved the names of the twelve sons of Jacob and also the words "Urim and Thummin." To this breastplate the apostle Paul alludes in Hebrews."
In the Old Testament, the priesthood was not annexed to a certain family, till after the promulgation of the law of Moses. Before that time, the first-born of each family, the fathers, the princes, the kings were born priests, in their own cities, and in their own houses. Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, and Job, Abimelech, and Laban, Isaac and Jacob, offered, personally, their own sacrifices. In the solemnity of the covenant made by the Lord with his people, at the foot of Mount Sinai, Moses performed the office of mediator, and young men were chosen from among Israel, to perform the office of priests. . . . Some have pretended, that the high-priesthood was exercised, even after the law, by others beside the family of Aaron. For this are produced the examples of Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and Saul, who sacrificed on some occasions. --Granting these facts, yet nobody denies, first, that a prophet may extraordinarily, and by a particular revelation, offer sacrifice. Secondly, this liberty was of much greater extent before the building of the temple, than after the public worship of God was fixed at Jerusalem. Thirdly, it is not certain but Joshua, Samuel, and Saul might offer their sacrifices by the hands of priests; for often the Scripture affirms that to be done by a man's self, which is only done by his orders. . . . Corporal defects, which excluded from the legal priesthood, and from its privileges, ought in proportion to be understood in an exalted and spiritual sense, in respect of the Christian priesthood. [This is too loosely stated: Corporal defects exclude from the priesthood, on the principle that nothing unfit, nothing by possibility verging on the ridiculous, or indecorous, or contemptible, or at which by-standers might take offence, should be allowed in the service of God. The nature, therefore, of the defect should be well considered." [no page numbers; emphasis in original]

Nature of Source: Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible was a well respected and widely published treatise on the subjects contained in the Old and New Testaments. In addition to the standard treatment of names and subjects (in alphabetical order), Calmet offers an explication of the "antiquities, habits, buildings, and other curiosities of the Jews." [title page] Comment: This quotation is taken from the entry on "Priesthood." Here, Calmet defines four kinds of priesthood--natural priesthood, Melchisedec priesthood, priesthood of Aaronic, and priesthood of Christ.
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. 1. That of kings, princes, heads of families, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, because nature and reason teach us, that the honour of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the most mature in understanding, and the greatest in dignity. 2. The priesthood according to the order of Melchisedec, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity; because Melchisedec was raised up of God, to represent the priesthood of Jesus Christ [rather, the priesthood of Melchisedec combined in the same person the right of the kingly and of the priestly offices, with that of the first-born, to exercise the priesthood: or, he was at once king, priest, and prophet, i.e. authoritative teacher, in every sense of the term.] 3. The priesthood of Aaron and his family, which subsisted as long as the religion of the Jews. 4. Lastly, the priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the new law. The priesthood of Jesus Christ, is infinitely superior to all other, in its duration, its dignity, its prerogatives, its object, and its power. The priesthood of Aaron was to end, but that of Jesus Christ is everlasting. That of Aaron was limited to his own family, was exercised only in the temple, and among only one people; its object was bloody sacrifices and purifications, which were only external, and could not remit sins; but the priesthood of Jesus Christ includes the entire Christian church, spread over the face of the whole earth, and among all nations of the world. The Epistle to the Hebrews should be considered by those, who would comprehend the excellence of the priesthood of the new law above that of the law of Moses." [no page numbers; emphasis in original]
"Wherefore all the persecutions, and cruel deaths, that have transpired in the world, among mankind; not only the persecution and crucifixion of Jesus Christ; but also all the sufferings and martyrdoms committed by cruel men, have had their rise and spring from man's unjust and unrighteous use of his liberty and power, conferred upon him only to do his Maker's will, in all things. But the sequel, as well as the very reason of things, clearly shews, that man, in his probationary state, was possessed of a power and liberty (uncontrolled by any other power) to do his Maker's will, by his instruction and aid, which was freely offered to his acceptance, or not to do it, if he chose to comply with the temptation. As he had communicated to him by his Maker a power of entire free choice. For if this was not the case he could never be virtuous or wicked, as all virtue consists in choosing the good, and all sin in his choosing the evil, independent of any other cause, but his own choice. And no doubt had the Israelites all been faithful to that outward covenant, given them through Moses, they would all have been prepared to receive their Messiah in the way of his coming, as did those who believed on him. And by which the end of his coming would have been much more fully answered. As all Israel then, like the disciples of Jesus Christ, would as willingly as they, have passed from the Old, and entered cheerfully into the New Dispensation. Hence no suffering, no crucifixion, no death of Jesus Christ, would have taken place; but when his ministry on earth was finished, by fulfilling the law, and abolishing that outward covenant, and turning the minds of the people to the law written in the heart, by a life of perfect righteousness and self denial, he had introduced his disciples into the gospel, he would, like Enoch and Elijah, have been translated, without suffering the pains of death." Place of Publication: Philadelphia
Publisher: American Sunday-School Union
Date of Publication: 1838 (second edition)
Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, call no. BS 440 .U55
Nature of Source: A dictionary containing definitions and explanations of personalities and events found in the Old and New Testaments.
This passage comes from the entry on "Baptized for the Dead." Rather than considering baptism for the dead as an historical occurrence, the author understands the Biblical discussion in Corinthians as symbolic of the resurrection.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "(1 Cor. xv. 29) Various interpretations have been put upon this phrase. The most simple and natural explanation is perhaps the most likely to be correct. We shall therefore interpret this by other passages of similar import. Paul, who wrote this epistle, speaks, in his letter to the Romans, of some who are buried with Christ in baptism unto death; wherein also they are risen with him unto newness of life. (Rom. vi. 4.) And again in his letters to the Colossians he speaks of those who were buried with Christ in baptism, and were risen with him through the faith of the operations of God, who hath raised him from the dead. (Col. ii. 12.) From these expressions we may infer that the apostle regarded baptism as the symbol of a present resurrection from the death of trespasses and sins, to a life of holiness; and also as a symbol of a participation in the future and final resurrection. But, if there is no such thing as a resurrection from the dead, then the ordinance, in this view, is vain and useless. The substance of the argument is, that if the dead rise not, the ordinance of baptism could have no authority, because Christ, in whose name it was administered, could not have risen, and it could be of no use, because upon the supposition that the dead rise not, those to whom it was administered would never live beyond the present life. This interpretation is confirmed by an examination of verses 30 and 32 of the context." (p. 91; emphasis in original) Additionally explained is the occurrence of "lay baptism" where infants near death were baptized by persons not holding ministerial authority.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD, a practice formerly in use, when a person dying without baptism, another was baptized in his stead; thus supposing that God would accept the baptism of the proxy, as though it had been administered to the principal. Chrysostom says, this was practised among the Marcionites with a great deal of ridiculous ceremony, which he thus describes:--After any catechumen was dead, they hid a living man under the bed of the deceased; then, coming to the dead man, they asked him whether he would receive baptism; and he making no answer, the other answered for him, and said he would be baptized in his stead; and so they baptized the living for the dead. . . . Lay baptism we find to have been permitted by both the common prayer books of king Edward and queen Elizabeth, when an infant was in immediate danger of death, and a lawful minister could no be had. This was founded on a mistaken notion of the impossibility of salvation without the sacrament of baptism, but afterwards, when they came to have clearer notions of the sacraments, it was unanimously resolved, in a convocation held in 1575, that even private baptism in a case of necessity was only to be administered by a lawful minister." This passage consists of Osterwald's view of authority within the Christian church. Arguing that all modern ministers derive their authority from Jesus Christ, the author notes that Christ will ratify in heaven the actions of his earthly ministers. Osterwald, moreover, provides for changes in church organization as long as the modifications comport with the "laws of the Gospel, Prudence, and Charity."

Excerpt (pages): "Authority. In the Church there is no authority, properly speaking, besides the authority of Christ. But whatever things are transacted by the Church, or his Ministers derive their whole authority from Christ. And do not bind men's consciences but as far as they are done in his name. For in that case, whatever the Church does, Christ ratifies. Matt. xviii. 18-20. Whatesoever thing ye shall bind upon earth, shall be bound in Heaven. John xx. 23. With respect to things necessary to salvation, the Church has no power to advance new laws, or to make any new articles of faith; in other cases, which God hath not determined, and yet ought to be determined, for the preservation of order, the Church may enact laws, for otherwise no society could subsist. 1 Cor. xiv. 40. Let all things be done decently and in order. Thus, with respect to the various circumstances of divine worship, time, place, &c. the Church may determine, providing that its determination, be conformable with the laws of the Gospel, Prudence, and Charity, and all ought to submit to statutes of this nature." (p. 310)
Thomas Chubb, a former glove maker and candle weigher, espouses a deistic perspective which requires the truths of the Bible to comport to rigorous standards of reason. The two-volume series contains: remarks on the scriptures; observations on the Reverend Mr. Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses; the author's farewell to his readers; and a variety of tracts on subjects including Melchizedek. The articles were collected following Chubb's death.

Comment: In this excerpt, Chubb describes the ancient Christian concept of consecration. He determines that the law was instituted by the apostles in order to procure great wealth for the church and its leaders. Accordingly, he finds the principle abhorrent and injurious to the general church body.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "...the disciples of Christ, or Christians, are but one family or household, who have one common property, in which each individual is interested; of which the apostles and clergy were constituted trustees and directors; and, in consequence of this principle, each individual brought the apostles and clergy (as the overseers of this family) all that surplus of fortune which was over and above what was necessary to answer the present exigencies of life. . . . Whether this constitution, of a union of property and community of worldly goods, was of divine, or only of apostolical appointment, does not clearly appear from the history. . . . St. Peter considered the aforementioned constitution to be but human, because he supposed the disciples to be at liberty whether they would comply with it, or not: but then, this must have been the case, supposing it to be a divine constitution, because as there was then no compulsive power in the church, so every man must have been a volunteer, must have been at liberty whether, and how far, he would comply with this constitution. . . . Nevertheless, though it be not clear, from the history, whether the constitution referred to was esteemed by the first Christians to be of divine, or only of apostolical appointment; yet this, I think, is evident, that it was most likely to produce consequences greatly injurious and hurtful to mankind, or, at least, to the Christian churches that were to be directed by it, whatever good purpose might be intended to be served thereby; as it was calculated for bringing into the hands of the apostles, and the christian [sic] clergy, great wealth, and an uncontrollable power in the use and application of it, which must, of course, make them greatly powerful in other respects; the bad consequences of which, surely, are too well known." Comment: In this excerpt, Chubb describes the corruption of the ancient texts of the Old Testament. Central to Chubb's argument is the concept that the corruption occurred under the hands of Christians rather than Jews.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "And if the books of the Old-Testament have been greatly corrupted, as is pretended, then they must needs be a very unsafe guide to us; seeing we cannot distinguish and separate the parts that are corrupted from those that are not; and then the putting those corrupted books upon us as a sacred record must be a most gross imposition. And if the Old-Testament be greatly corrupted, as is set forth above; yet, surely, such corruption cannot, with any colour of justice, be charged upon the unbelieving Jews. At, and some time after, the opening of the christian dispensation, all its professors were Jews, or persons who had been converted from Judaism to Christianity; . . . so, of course, those converted Jews, which then constituted the Christian church, must have had many copies of the Old-Testament in their hands, from which copies those books must of necessity have been transmitted from age to age, all along, through Christian hands, down to this time, and not from and through the hands of the unbelieving Jews, with whom the Christians had no friendly correspondence, but the contrary, as these were at perpetual variance with each other; and therefore, if our old testament [sic] be derived from a corrupted copy or copies, then such copy or copies must have been corrupted by the Christians themselves through whose hands alone those books have been transmitted to us, and not by the unbelieving Jews, who could have no hand in any such matter. But, admitting the books of the old testament [sic] have been, through the weakness or wickedness of translators or transcribers, greatly corrupted . . ." (pp. 383-384; emphasis in original)

Nature of Source: A lengthy (120 pages) discourse on the priesthood in the Old and New Testaments. Gray considers three types of priesthood--Aaronic, Melchisedec, and Christ--and delineates similarities and differences among them. Gray translates Hebrew and Greek quotations from the Bible as a major part of his argument. He emphasizes particularly the ancient use of the word "Cohen" which carried a double meaning of both religious priest and minister of a political sovereign.
Comment: In No Man Knows My History, Fawn Brodie points to this treatise as a foundation for Joseph's development of the Melchizedek Priesthood. Gray appears to be motivated by an ongoing controversy over the nature of the priesthood held by Christ; specifically what, as Psalm 110 describes, was the "parallel between the priesthood of Melchisedec and that of Messiah" [iii].

Excerpt (pages): "In the omission of the names of his parents and genealogy, the time of his birth and length of his life, exhibiting an indefinite reign and priesthood, according to the Apostle's exposition, Heb. vii, 5. The import of this is, that he came not to his office by right of primogeniture, (which implies a genealogy,) or by the way of succession, but was raised up and immediately called of God to it. In that respect Christ is said to be a priest after his 'order.' Then, again, that he had no successor, nor could have; for there was no law to constitute an order of succession, so that he was a priest only upon an extraordinary call. In this respect our Lord's priesthood answers to his, because it is wholly in himself, who has no successor." [p. 636]

Publisher: W.W. Woodward

Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, call no. MICROFICHE 080 Sh64a no. 28040

Nature of Source: In this work, the Reverend Charles Buck (author of The Theological Dictionary) provides religious insights into perplexing questions about human existence. Subjects include: human life; human nature; knowledge of God; the soul; and preparation for eternity.

Comment: This excerpt is taken from the chapter entitled "The Last Judgment." Buck describes an end-of-the-world scenario where the Earth (including natural beauty and man-made industries) would be destroyed and returned to its natural state of chaos.

Excerpt (pages): "Then shall the righteous be separated from the wicked. The final sentence shall be pronounced. 'The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.' Then shall all things here be dissolved; 'the whole beautiful fabric shall be thrown down. As soon as the destroying angel has sounded the last trumpet, the everlasting mountains fall; the foundations of the world shall be shaken; the beauties of nature, the decorations of art, the labour of industry shall perish in one common flame. The globe itself shall return into its ancient chaos without form and void; or, like a star fallen from the heavens, shall be effaced from the universe, and its place shall know it no more." Excerpt (pages): "As I believe there can not be a greater absurdity than to apply personality to God, in any right sense of the word. As personality implies locality, which signifies limited to place, which would be very impious to say of the infinite Jehovah. . . . There was nothing more clearly impressed upon the Israelites, by their great lawgiver, than to acknowledge but one God. And although they often asserted that the Spirit of the Lord came to or was upon them, yet they manifest no idea of any divisibility, or distinction of persons between God and his Spirit. But wherever the Holy Spirit of God is there is God, and where God is, there is the Holy Spirit, or Holy Ghost, which are one, as the terms are synonymous. For God is a Spirit, and nothing but Spirit. And when this Spirit, or God, acts or operates upon the spirit of man, in his first operations he quickens and enlightens man's spirit, and in this operation he bears record of his own life in the soul of man, as the Holy Spirit, or Holy Ghost." ... I believe that the Almighty Creator of the Universe, never had but one sole purpose and design, in creating man, and placing him on this terraqueous globe; and that was to do his will, and thereby to continue in a state of happy union and communion with him, through the Spirit. And did so order and arrange all things here on earth, in his wisdom and goodness, as to constitute a state of probation to man, during his militant state, or while his immortal soul continued in connexion with these mortal bodies; which were not to continue any longer in existence, than during the time of this probationary scene; which was necessary to give the rational intelligent creature Man a fit opportunity to rise above that innocent state in which he was created, to the exalted state of virtue and glory, by a just and righteous improvement of the liberty and power conferred upon him by his gracious Creator, for that purpose, and that purpose only, agreeably to the instruction of Divine Wisdom. Hence we conclude that God never sent his Son Jesus Christ, nor any of his rational creation, purposely into the world to suffer death by cruel men; but only, in his free and voluntary choice, to attend to, and do his holy will, in all things; and thereby glorify and enjoy him. Which all agree to be the chief end and design of man's creation." [pp. 16-18; emphasis in original]

In this passage, Osterwald describes the eternal punishment of the wicked. Much like Joseph Smith, Osterwald's hell does not continue indefinitely but is tailored to each individual. For many, then, the punishment for sin will not last eternally, but will cease when the individual has suffered sufficiently for his or her transgressions.

Excerpt (pages): "With respect to the body it is asked, whether the wicked shall be tormented with material fire? Truely [sic] we cannot conceive that bodies should always be burning, and yet that they should not perish, nor be destroyed. It is very probable, that the wicked shall be tormented for some space of time, with that fire which, at the end of the world, shall consume all things, which being finished, they shall survive. Therefore, the proper, and most severe punishments, are those of the soul, and that most intense sorrow, which proceeds from the loss of the chief good, which is attended with desperation, and remorse of conscience. For conscience will accuse the wicked, because they rejected salvation, when offered them, and willingly thrust themselves into the banishment. . . . Many, when discoursing upon the punishments of the damned, attribute to them hatred against God, blasphemies, &c. But absurdly. For hatred against God cannot be applied to any creature, however, wicked, and if such a hatred were to be found among the damned, they would not grieve so intensely on account of their being separated from him. . . . With respect to the duration of these punishments, we learn from the word of God, that they are eternal in the same respect, as in the context, life is termed eternal. . . . It is sufficient to believe, that whether God hath spoken is true, and that he will not punish any, beyond their deserts [sic]. The difficulties which are moved concerning the eternity of punishments, take their rise from our not understanding precisely, what the state of reprobates will be. . . .[E]very one should be punished according to the number and nature of their sins. But the atrocity [sic], and the measure of sins shall be estimated according to the degree of knowledge and grace, which was granted in this life." (pp. 397-398)

Excerpt (pages): "In reading the Scriptures of the Old Testament, it is impossible not to mark with serious attention, the frequent visible appearances of God to the patriarchs and prophets; and, what is still more singular, his visible residence in a cloud of glory, both among the Jews in the wilderness and in their sacred tabernacle and temple. The fact of such appearances cannot be disputed; they are allowed by all, and in order to point out the bearing of this fact upon the point at issue, the Divinity of Christ . . . Thus the same glorious being, bearing the appellation of JEHOVAH, is seen as the object of the worship and trust of ages, and that under a visible manifestation; displaying attributes, engaged in operations, and assuming dignities and honours, which unequivocally array him with the majesty of absolute divinity. . . . We have seen, that it was the Angel of Jehovah who gave the law to the Israelites, and that in his own name, though still an angel, a messenger in the transaction; being at once servant and Lord, angel and Jehovah, circumstances which can only be explained on the hypothesis of his Divinity, and for which neither Arianism nor Socinianism can give any solution. He therefore was the person who made the covenant, usually called the Mosaic, with the children of Israel. The prophet Jeremiah however expressly says, that the new covenant with Israel was to be made by the same person who had made the old. . . . If then, as we learn from the Apostle Paul, this new covenant predicted by Jeremiah is the Christian dispensation, and Christ be its author; the Christ of the New Testament, and the Angel of Jehovah of the Old, are the same person." Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Litchfield
Publisher: T. Collier
Date of Publication: 1787
Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, call no. MICROFICHE 080 Sh64 Evans 19987
Nature of Source: The pamphlet contains a discourse by Josiah Sherman, pastor of the church in Goshen [no further geographical or denominational information was included]. Split into two parts, this doctrinal treatise first analyzes the person and calling of Melchizedek and then turns to a discussion of the priesthood and calling of Christ.
Comment: In keeping with centuries of Jewish religious thought, Sherman determines that Melchizedek was actually Shem, the son of Noah. Most interestingly, the author states that all saints (both men and women?) will be made "kings and priests" in the hereafter.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "But the most probable and common received opinion is, that Shem, the son of Noah, was this Melchizedek. A very famous learned divine, produceth twenty-two Rabies [sic] of the Jews to support this opinion; and he assures us that it was the common received opinion among the Jews. It is evident from the genealogy of Shem's posterity, set down [in] Gen. xi. that Shem was living at this time, and lived about an hundred years in Isaac's time; and he was the oldest man then in the world. He was born near an hundred years before the flood, and none born before that time were then living. So that it is probable [that?] his descent, pedigree or parentage, was not then known. But Shem was the most honourable man then in the world and therefore might well be accounted greater than Abraham [illegible] was ten generations before Abraham, as you may see, Gen. xi. Shem was a most righteous man--and he was a king, according to his birth--For it is probable he was the eldest son of Noah, as he is always reckoned first when their names are mentioned in scripture; and if so, then the kingdom belonged to him according to the custom of those times--the eldest took the rule and government of the rest of the family. . . . God is stiled the Lord God of Shem, Gen. ix. 26. and therefore he might fitly be called the priest of the most high God. . . . Shem was the root of the church of God, from whence Abraham and his posterity sprang; so that he might well be accounted greater than Abraham; and Abraham might well stile him Melchi, My king. . . . We have an account that Shem lived, but we have no account in scripture that he died. And it is said among the Jews that Shem never did die, but was translated, that he should not see death. But he is entered into the heavens, and there abideth a priest continually, as do all the saints, who are made kings and priests to God." [pp. 5-6; emphasis in original]

Nature of Source: In a sermon dated 18 August 1814, Robert White, pastor of the congregation at Fogg's Manor (no further geographical or denominational information was included), examined the character of Melchisedek and determined that the ancient king was actually the Biblical character of Job. Because Melchisedek presents a type of Christ, White asserts that Christians need to understand Melchisedek in order to comprehend Christ more perfectly. "If a type be to us unknown," he argues in the sermon's introduction, "to us it cannot answer the purpose of a type. If any part of a type be unknown, so far the person or thing typified remains in obscurity. In that proportion, in which a type is known to us, in the same proportion it answers to us the purpose of a type. The conclusion, therefore, is plain and necessary, that it is both our duty and privilege to become as perfectly acquainted as possible with every type mentioned in scripture. . . . [I]t is our duty and privilege to take as accurate a survey of [Melchisedek's] person, offices and character as we can; that from so eminent a type of our Great High Priest, and Omnipotent King, we may derive every possible advantage." [p. 4]

Comment: White is weighing in on a longstanding debate among Christian and Jewish theologians. Unlike other commentators, however, who claimed Melchisedek was everything from an angel to the Messiah, White presents a unique perspective in linking the King of Salem to Job.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "The most extensively adopted opinion, respecting Melchisedek, is, that he was a wise man, not of the Jewish, but of the Gentile race. And to me it appears that Job was the man: to prove which is the design of this discourse. I shall therefore lay before you some arguments to prove, I. That Job and Abraham were contemporaries. II. That Job was a King. III. That Job was a Priest. IV. That the character given us in scripture of Melchisedek, and that given us of Job agree in one and the same person: who presents us with an eminent type of Jesus Christ our great high Priest and adorable King. . . . The first difficulty that occurs, is to reconcile the two terms Job and Melchizedek, so as to agree in one and the same person. This, however, may be readily done by referring to the custom of all ages, that is, to designate a person both by his name and by his title. E.G. the title, President of the United States, and the name, James Madison, mean one and the same person. Melchisedek is properly a title, and signifies King of Righteousness: so that Melchisedek and Job may consistently mean one and the same person. . . . The most prominent feature in the character of Melchisedek, as drawn by the Apostle [Paul], is, that he was a better man than even the patriarch Abraham. 'And without all contradiction,' says he, 'the less is blessed of the better.' This perfectly agrees with the character of Job. In the first chapter of his book and eighth verse we read; 'And the Lord said unto Satan, hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil.' This is the testimony, not of a man, or the son of man, but of Jehovah himself. Without controversy then Job was the best man on Earth in his day. And if as has been proved, he and Abraham were contemporaries, then he was a better man than Abraham. But this is the very thing, respecting Melchisedek, which the Apostle asserts. Thus evidently does it appear from viewing Melchisedek in his private character as man, that Job was the man. Nor does it appear any less evidently from viewing him in his public character as king and priest." [pp. 6-7, 14]

The person of Melchizedek presents an interesting subject of inquiry. He has been variously and absurdly supposed to be the Holy Spirit, the Son of God, Enoch, or an angel; more probably, Shem. The latter opinion has been elaborately supported by Mr. Taylor, the substance of whose statements and reasoning is as follows:-

From the allusions to the history of Melchizedek in Scripture, we gather, 1. That he had undergone deep distress; had implored the Preserving Power to interfere in his behalf, and had been heard. 2. That he had exemplified great piety and obedience. 3. That he was not a priest by regular official descent, that is, by birth, but by divine appointment. 4. That he was a king. 5. That the Levitical priesthood is very inferior to his; as --(1.) It is comparatively modern.--(2.) It has not equal dignity, wanting royalty.--(3.) It often changes hands; and sometimes is held by persons not very holy.--(4.) It concerns only a single small nation; and does not so much as assume to officiate for mankind in general.

We turn to the Bible history of Shem, a person of conspicuous piety after the deluge; witness his behavior to his father, Noah, whom Ham, his brother, had exposed. It is natural to infer the same pious disposition of character before that catastrophe. His name, imposed, apparently, prior to that event, signifies settled, steady: and, as Noah was 'a preacher of righteousness' to the antediluvians, we may think the same of his son Shem, who succeeded in the priesthood. That dreadful event which was coming on the earth was certainly foretold to Noah; and if to Noah to Shem, who also assisted in the preparation of the ark. Deeply pious, and eminently sedate, he could not but look forward with apprehension, and every thing warrants the belief, that both the son and the father would depurate and deplore the judgment they awaited. In other words--the piety of Shem prompted him, under these trying circumstances, to address with prayers and supplications, with strong cryings and tears, that celestial Power which was able to save him from death; in which this patriarch was the counterpart of our Lord Jesus; who, foreseeing his descent into the silent tomb, (as Shem foresaw his enclosure in the floating tomb of the ark,) prayed, 'If it were possible let this cup pass from me;' but in the issue, as Shem in obedience to the divine injunction entered the ark, so did Jesus enter the grave: . . . The ark discharged its inhabitants on the mountains of Caucasus; whence it is probable the patriarch Shem traveled, in process of time, to Canaan; there he was acknowledged as a royal priest; being, first, king of justice. And who could more properly exercise this office? To promulgate laws, or to apply them; to direct in matters of jurisprudence; to combine the dignity of the magistrate with the affection of the patriarch; to promote the welfare of those communities which were his posterity--who could be more suitable than Shem? [H]e was truly 'the king of justice.'" [p. 792; emphasis in original] heretics affirmed, that Melchizedec was a heavenly power superior to Jesus Christ, since Melchizedec was the intercessor and mediator of the angels, and Jesus Christ was so only for men. That Jesus Christ was but the copy of Melchizedec, and his priesthood was formed only on the model of that of Melchizedec, according to that of the Psalmist, cx .4. . . . The Jews according to the report of Jerom, and the Samaritans, according to Epiphanius, maintained that Melchizedec was the patriarch Shem, son of Noah; which opinion has been followed by a great number of modern writers. M. Jurien undertook to prove, that Melchizedec was Ham. A French author mentioned by F. Salien will have Melchizedec to be Enoch. Another, confuted by F. Petau, said that the Magi who came to Bethlehem to adore Jesus Christ, were Enoch, Melchizedec, and Elias. Some Jewish authors have inferred, that Melchizedec was a bastard, because scripture says nothing of his parents or descent. Damian the heretic, of the number of the Melchisedecians, affirmed that Melchizedec who appeared to Abraham, was the son of God, and that the patriarch worshipped him as the Messiah. Peter Cunaeus has revived this opinion, and supported it with much earnestness. Peter du Moulin has also asserted it, and in 1698, James Gaillard undertook the defence of it, [and some continue still to think so.]

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: North Third Street, Philadelphia

Publisher: Jane Aitken

Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, Microfiche 080 Sh64a no. 20239

Nature of Source: A lengthy (120 pages) discourse on the priesthood in the Old and New Testaments. Gray considers three types of priesthood--Aaronic, Melchisedec, and Christ--and delineates similarities and differences among them. Gray translates Hebrew and Greek quotations from the Bible as a major part of his argument. He emphasizes particularly the ancient use of the word "Cohen" which carried a double meaning of both religious priest and minister of a political sovereign.

Comment: In No Man Knows My History, Fawn Brodie points to this treatise as a foundation for Joseph's development of the Melchizedek Priesthood. Gray appears to be motivated by an ongoing controversy over the nature of the priesthood held by Christ; specifically what, as Psalm 110 describes, was the "parallel between the priesthood of Melchisedec and that of Messiah" [iii].

Excerpt (pages): "... [W]e collect that Melchisedec's, Aaron's, and Messiah's priesthood were [foreign phrase] everlasting priesthoods: that is priesthoods continuing throughout their dispensations respectively; though these dispensations were of very unequal duration. Of the truth of this representation there can be no doubt whatever:
indeed it is impossible that it should be false, because it resolves itself in two matters of fact. The first fact, is that Melchisedec, Aaron, and Messiah, had each a priesthood [foreign phrase], for ever: of this the language of the divine spirit is the evidence. The second fact, is that these priesthloods were of very unequal length: Melchisedec's lasting only during his own life; Aaron's lasting during the Horeb covenant, say from his consecration at Mount Sinai till the burning of the temple at Jerusalem by Vespasian; but Christ's lasting from his incarnation to eternity. Now whenever terms expressive of duration, are applied to the offices or official functions of these priests, such terms must be understood relatively to their respective dispensation." [pp. 98-99; emphasis in original] himself a standing and eminent type of Christ Jesus, who had neither father nor mother, predecessor nor successor of the lineage of the priests, but sprang from a tribe of which none gave attendance at the altar. Melchizedek was a king as well as a priest, and the only one that ever was appointed by God to sustain and execute both these offices. He had a prerogative above all others of the order of priests; for he received tithes of the priests. He conferred a blessing upon Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the great progenitor of all the Levitical priests: So that we may easily see the difference between the order of Aaron and the order of Melchizedek, as to their priesthood. And the order of Melchizedek is vastly more excellent than the order of Aaron.--Melchizedek's order is the most ancient, and claims the superiority on that account. It is probable that he was a priest in two worlds, i.e., before and after the flood, and will be a priest to God forever. The time when he was ordained to this office is unknown; but that he was ordained by God himself to it is certain; otherwise he could not have been stiled the priest of the most high God, and so greatly honoured by the patriarch Abraham. Aaron's order had a beginning; but we can find no beginning of Melchizedek's order, and yet he was a true priest. . . . [T]he Apostle [Paul] goes on to shew how much the priesthood of Jesus Christ excelleth the Levitical priesthood, and by this means to urge them to receive the Lord Jesus Christ in his priestly office, and reject all those typical priests, since that order is abolished by the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. The priesthood of Melchizedek was more excellent than that of Aaron; but yet Christ Jesus excelleth Melchizedek, as to the order of his priesthood, as far as the substance excelleth the shadow. . . . Melchizedek was a priest forever only in type, but Christ is so in reality." [pp. 7-9]

Excerpt (pages): "The second subject of inquiry is, in what sense Jesus is said to be a priest after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron. The first idea that strikes one, on hearing that one priest is after the order of another, is this--that they both have precisely the same rights and functions; and these functions the same efficacy. Thus, the high priests who succeeded Aaron, were of the same order with him: the office, its duties, and its efficacy, remained immutable; and descended pure and entire, like an estate equally incapable of waste and of augmentation. In this sense, Jesus was neither of the order of Melchisedec, nor of Aaron. His priesthood was peculiar: his sacrifice was his SOUL: . . . his intercession is carried on in heaven . . . Such a sacrifice neither Melchisedec nor Aaron ever offered; . . . It was the imperfection of the antecedent priesthoods that rendered his necessary: and had his been the very same with them, the imperfection must have continued. But he assumed a perfect priesthood, to which nothing was equal; a priesthood, which finished transgression, and made an end of sin. We must, therefore, search for some other idea of order. . . . 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent; Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec.' The chief difficulty lies in the phrase [foreign phrase], 'after the ORDER.' Paul's translation, which is also that of the Septuagint, is [foreign phrase]: and as to the idea which he affixed to [foreign phrase], we collect it from his own synonym [sic], chap. vii. 15. [foreign phrase]. 'After the SIMILITUDE of Melchisedec.' There is another phrase, in the third verse, which also goes to fix the apostle's idea: Melchisedec is spoken of as one, [foreign phrase], 'made like unto the Son of God.' Thus then Messiah was made a priest, [foreign phrase], 'after the order,' that is, [foreign phrase], 'after the similitude' of Melchisedec. Or, inverting the related ideas, Melchisedec, [foreign phrase], 'was constituted a similitude, or type, of the Son of God.' TYPICAL SIMILITUDE, then, is the apostle's idea. But here we are met by a question of some apparent difficulty. Was not Aaron, it may be asked, a type of the Son of God: was there not a similitude between his and Messiah's priesthood: and, if so, was not Jesus a priest after the similitude, or order of Aaron, as well as after the similitude, or order of Melchisedec? The correctness of the assumption is admitted; viz. that Aaron was a type, or similitude of Messiah, in his priestly character. He was 'called of God:' he was 'taken from among men;' and, 'ordained for men, in things pertaining to God;' he entered once a year into the most holy place, 'not without blood;' he served 'unto the example, and shadow, of heavenly things;'--The law, which had a shadow of good things to come, had not a single type of Messiah so illustrious as the high priest entering into the holiest of all, with the blood of atonement, and incense of intercession. The literal fact is, both the priesthood of Aaron, and that of Melchisedec, were types of the priesthood of Christ: Aaron and Melchisedec, so far as their characters coincided, were types of equal value . . . But why then is Messiah represented as a priest after the order of Melchisedec? The reason is as follows. Melchisedec possessed all the typical characteristics of Aaron; but, in addition to these, he had sundry peculiar characteristics: now the priesthood of Jesus, which tallied exactly with all the typical characteristics of Melchisedec's, must be different from the priesthood of Aaron. So definitely were these peculiarities marked, that every candid and judicious observer must, on seeing him, exclaim, here is a priest, who is not an Aaronic priest! This distinction of the priesthood of Jesus from the priesthood of Aaron is a most important point: to mark the distinction was the chief, perhaps I might say the sole end of the type, and the sole end of the apostle's argument." Nature of Source: An edition of the Authorized Translation of the Bible which contains commentary and critical notes collected by Adam Clarke.
Comment: This excerpt is taken from the commentary on Psalms 110. Though Calmet's concept of the three orders of the priesthood received wide publication, the dilation on the perpetual nature of the royal priesthood is particularly interesting. The notion of perpetual priesthood (which could perhaps continue to the present day) compares with the order of patriarchal priesthood mentioned in section 86 of the Doctrine and Covenants.
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "Calmet properly observes that there were three orders of priesthood. 1. That of royalty. All ancient kings being, in virtue of their office, priests also. This seems to have been considered as the natural right of royalty, as it obtained in almost every nation of the earth, from the beginning of the world down to the end of the Roman empire. 2. That of the first-born. This right appertained naturally to Reuben, as the first born in the family of Jacob. 3. That of the Levites, instituted by God Himself, and taken from Reuben because of his transgression. The Levitical priesthood ended with the Jewish polity; and that also of the first-born, which had been absorbed in it. This order, therefore, was not perpetual; it was intended to last only for a time. But that of royalty is perpetual (though not now in general use,) because founded in what is called natural right. It is therefore, according to this most ancient order, that Christ is a Priest for ever. The kings of England, as heads of the church, appointing all bishops, continue to assume, in a certain way, this original right." (no page numbers; emphasis in original)

Nature of Source: Article, taken from the Boston Quarterly Review, in which Brownson defends ideas found in a previously published article on the Laboring Classes. Some of the charges he refuted include: opposition to Christianity; opposition to the Priesthood; and his analysis of the working classes.
Comment: This passage is taken from a section entitled "Opposition to the Priesthood." Brownson describes how, under the new covenant of the Christian gospel, a Melchizedek priesthood of all believers will proclaim the "natural and essential equality of all men."
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "Under Judaism, there was a regularly constituted priesthood, hereditary in a particular tribe and family, but nothing of this is recognised under the Gospel. . . . Now, here is the new covenant under which we are. This new covenant recognises but one Mediator, Jesus Christ, who gave himself a ransom for us. It recognises no priestly order, except the order of Melchisedec; that is, an order of priests, who are priests not by human appointment, or human ordinances, not by consecration with holy oil, or the laying on of the hands of the presbytery; but by the inward anointing of the Holy Ghost, by having God's law within, and written on the heart. After the order of Melchisedec, the new covenant proposes to make all men priests. Under the Gospel, all men are evidently called to be 'kings and priests.' This fact is important. Under the Jewish dispensation, only the descendants of David could be kings, and only the tribe of Levi could furnish priests. In calling all men to be kings and priests, the Gospel took ground directly opposite to the Jewish, and proclaimed, on the one hand, the royal and priestly nature of every man, and on the other, the abolition of all distinctions founded on birth or blood; in other words, it proclaimed the natural and essential equality of all men. Moreover, in seeking to make every man a king and a priest, the Gospel, of course, seeks to dispense with everything like a separate order of kings or of priests. If all men should become kings, the effect would be the same with having no king at all; for all would be equal. If all men should become priests, it would be the abolition of the priestly order, as a separate order. In relation to that order, in the sense in which we have condemned it, we should stand precisely as if we had no priests. Now, as the Gospel makes no provision for a clerical order, as it contemplates making every man his own priest, we have a right to infer, that it does not authorize a priesthood in the practical sense in which mankind understand the term. If there be any truth in the statement, that we are under the new covenant, a covenant which recognizes no outward mediator, no outward priesthood, but simply the priesthood of the soul, expressed by putting the law in the inward parts, and writing it on the heart, whereby every man may be his own priest, it follows, that we may oppose the clergy, in the sense in which we do oppose them, without opposing the Gospel; nay, that if we would obey the Gospel, we must oppose them." Nature of Source: Joseph Priestley was an eminent dissenting divine and experimental philosopher who gained fame not only for his theological views but primarily for his scientific inquiries. Pastor of a dissenting congregation in Birmingham, he emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1794. Notes on all the Books of Scripture grew from his scriptural expositions while at Birmingham. From the preface: "It will be perceived that I have given very particular attention to the circumstances which prove the genuineness and divine authority of the books of scripture, especially those of the Old Testament, which are principally objected to by unbelievers, and which have appeared the most difficult to intelligent christians; some of whom have been ready to reject them altogether, and the religion they contain, while they profess their belief of christianity. But the divine mission of Moses and that of Jesus are inseparably connected, and the religion of the Hebrews and that of the christians are parts of the same scheme; so that the separation of them is absolutely impossible" [xii].

Comment: Taken from Priestley's commentary on Genesis 14. Priestley circumscribes the priesthood of Melchizedek to include ecclesiastical power only over those in his kingdom.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "Melchizedec was, no doubt, a prince, or chief, in this neighbourhood, but from whom he was descended is not said. Being a prince, he was also a priest, as in these antient [sic] times all kings were. Salem, where he reigned, was probably the same place with that which was mentioned in the gospel history, as being near the river Jordan, where John was baptizing. . . . This tithe which Abraham gave to Melchizedec, must have been a tenth part of the spoils recovered from the kings whom he had defeated; but why it was given to him does not appear. If he be considered as a priest, he was not so with respect to Abraham, or any other people than those over whom he reigned. Perhaps he might have been a sufferer by the incursion of those kings, and what was given him might be the amount of his loss." [p. 44]

Nature of Source: A lengthy (120 pages) discourse on the priesthood in the Old and New Testaments. Gray considers three types of priesthood--Aaronic, Melchisedec, and Christ--and delineates similarities and differences among them. Gray translates Hebrew and Greek quotations from the Bible as a major part of his argument. He emphasizes particularly the ancient use of the word "Cohen" which carried a double meaning of both religious priest and minister of a political sovereign.
Comment: In No Man Knows My History, Fawn Brodie points to this treatise as a foundation for Joseph's development of the Melchizedek Priesthood. Gray appears to be motivated by an ongoing controversy over the nature of the priesthood held by Christ; specifically what, as Psalm 110 describes, was the "parallel between the priesthood of Melchisedec and that of Messiah" [iii].
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "Of the divine origin of the priesthoods of Melchisedec, Aaron, and Jesus. According to the evidence of scriptural history, the only admissible evidence in the case, these three priesthoods were divinely constituted; and the only divinely constituted priesthoods that ever existed among men. Of these, calculating from the commencement of sacrificial functions, Melchisedec's was the first. It is obvious, that by priest is here meant an official character, a man 'taken from among men,' and 'ordained from men, in things pertaining to God, that he might offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin' [Heb. 5:1]. Of such, Melchisedec was the first. Previous to his day, the offering of gifts and sacrifices for sins was, like prayer, the common right of the faithful; as appears from the offerings of Cain and Abel, of Noah, &c. &c. In this situation matters continued in respect to worshippers generally, (the tribe which Melchisedec represented probably excepted,) and to the posterity of Abraham in particular; even after the constitution of God's covenant with him, and down to the consecration of Aaron. Previous to this latter period, there was not a priest in Abraham's family; but, as numerous instances attest, every worshipper offered up his own sacrifice, or invited and employed whatever assistants he pleased. For ages after the calling of Abraham, the institutions of true religion, and the dispensation of the Spirit of grace, were continued to several other tribes of men: among these also, the right to offer sacrifice, belonged, for any thing we know, to the faithful in common." Comment: Taken from Priestley's commentary on Psalms 110. Commenting on the "order of Melchisedec" Priestley contends that such an order did not exist in ancient times; rather, he believes that the priesthood power of Melchizedek and Abraham extended only to their families and dependants.

Excerpt (pages): "King and priest were synonymous in early times. Instead of the words according to the order of Melchizedec, some antient [sic] versions have because thou wilt be a righteous king; and it is the more probable that this is the meaning, because we no where read of such an order of priests as that of Melchizedec; nor does it appear from the account of Moses, that Melchizedec was more a priest than Abraham. They were both independent princes, who of course, according to the simple manners of those times, officiated as priests to their own families and dependants." [p. 246]

Comment: Taken from Priestley's commentary on Hebrews 7. In this passage, Priestley attacks Paul's analysis of Melchizedek. According to the commentator, Paul's attempt to portray Melchizedek as a type of the Messiah are misguided and illogical. Most interestingly, Priestley argues that the priesthood of Christ was only symbolic.

Excerpt (pages): "And there is nothing in all the writings of this apostle that is more open to objection than his reasoning concerning Melchizedec. . . .Salem was nothing more than the name of the city of which Melchizedec was king, and tho' this name signifies righteousness, or peace, it had nothing to do with the character of the prince who reigned there. A king of Salem, tho' denoting righteousness and peace, might have been a wicked and turbulent prince, troublesome to all his neighbours; and yet this writer seems to lay some stress on this circumstance of the name of his city. . . .Because the descent of Melchizedec is not mentioned by Moses, the writer of this epistle seems to have considered him as having had neither father nor mother; and because he is said to be a priest forever, as if he had never died. That something is meant by this writer more than that we are ignorant of the genealogy or age of Melchizedec, is evident from his mentioning these circumstances as an encomium, and from his adding that in these respects he resembles the son of God, the Messiah; for that, like him, he was a perpetual highpriest. . . .Another argument for the superiority of Melchizedec to Abraham, is that he blessed him, which, according to this writer implies superiority. But tho’ Pharaoh was blessed by Jacob, the superiority of the patriarch consisted in nothing besides his greater age. . . . We have now been directed to a variety of circumstances as implying the superiority of the priesthood of Jesus to that of Aaron; but it is only by way of figure that he can be said to be a priest at all; being, in reality no more a priest than he was a door, or vine, or any thing else to which he was occasionally compared. Beside the passage in the cxth. Psalm on which the whole of this argument hinges (for in no other passage is the Messiah said to be a priest) is, as I have shewn in my notes on that psalm, some very early corruption of the original text, and which we have now no means of restoring." Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Andover
Publisher: Flagg, Gould, and Newman
Date of Publication: 1833
Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, call no. BS 2775 .S78x
Nature of Source: In his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, Moses Stuart, Associate Professor of Sacred Literature in the Theological Seminary at Andover, is primarily concerned with refuting the recent work of Frederic Bleek, a German Biblical critic. The center of their debate concerns authorship of the epistle--Bleek argues that Apollos penned the letters while Stuart maintains a Pauline interpretation.

Comment: This quotation comes from Stuart's discussion of Hebrews 7, wherein Paul (though Bleek would disagree) considers the concept that Christ's priesthood was based on the order of Melchizedek.

Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "In respect to the object of this assertion, I apprehend nothing more is intended, than that the priesthood of Christ and of Melchizedek was not, like that of the sons of Aaron, limited to any definite period. In the absolute sense, [foreign phrase] clearly is not be understood, either of Melchizedek's priesthood or of Christ's. Melchizedek's priesthood terminated with his life; so Christ's priestly and kingly office as Mediator, will both cease when the work of redemption is fully accomplished, 1 Cor. 15:24-28. But in neither case is there any statute, which limits the specific time of accession to office and of egress from it. Of course the order of Christ's priesthood, and that of Melchizedek, differed greatly in this respect from that of the sons of Aaron, and was, as the writer goes on to declare, greatly superior to it. Dictator perpetus among the Romans, for example, was surely a higher, or at least a more honorable office, than that of ordinary Dictator. . . . The whole passage, from [foreign phrase] in v. 1, to [foreign phrase] in v. 3, is plainly a parenthetic explanation, (a very common occurrence in the writings of Paul), thrown in for the sake of suggesting to the reader's mind some considerations respecting the character and dignity of Melchizedek, which would be very useful in regard to a right understanding of the comparison that was to be made out in the sequel. . . . Nor is there any ground for supposing the apostle means to assert, that Melchizedek's high-priesthood continues in heaven; as some have imagined. There is no intimation in Scripture of any such thing with regard to any one but Jesus. I must therefore understand [foreign phrase] as being used figuratively here, in order to denote the brief and mutable condition of the Levitical priesthood." [pp. 395, 399; emphasis in original] Cohanim, mentioned Exod. xix. 22. 'And let the priests also, which come near unto the Lord, sanctify themselves; least the Lord break forth upon them.' What priests were these? These young men were the Cohanim, or ministers of Moses, whom he employed in the servile part of sacrificing, reserving the noble part, the sprinkling of the sacrificial blood to himself. What is the meaning of that promise, Exod. xix. 6. 'And ye shall be unto me,'--'a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation?' Would it not seem as if the idea of priestly consecration was familiar to the people of Israel, previous to the Horeb covenant and institution of the Levitical priesthood?--I answer, no. The candid reader must admit, that to adopt the hypothesis of an antecedent priesthood well known to the Israelites, while he finds no such order of men among the tribes of Abraham (and the solitary instance of Melchisedec was, in all probability, quite overlooked,) would be rash and unwarrantable. Without adopting so bold an hypothesis, the passage admits an easy interpretation, full of spirit and meaning, and perfectly consistent with the ascertained facts of ancient history. They had just left Egypt, where they had seen the priests occupy the most honourable station about the king, discharge the most important duties, and receive an ample reward for their services: and the passage of scripture under consideration may be viewed as alluding to that state of things, and as containing a promise that God, on being chosen king of the Israelitish nation, would make them all as honourable and happy as the priests of Egypt. To conclude this article of proof, it appears that Melchisedec was a priest of the most high God, and the first man that ever bore that character; Or, indeed, enjoyed it at all till the consecration of Aaron and his sons."

Nature of Source: Thomas Chubb, a former glove maker and candle weigher, espouses a deistic perspective which requires the truths of the Bible to comport to rigorous standards of reason. The two-volume series contains: remarks on the scriptures; observations on the Reverend Mr. Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses; the author's farewell to his readers; and a variety of tracts on subjects including Melchizedek. The articles were collected following Chubb's death.
Comment: Employing logic and reason, Chubb argues that miracles are not a reliable test to determine truth.
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "For as no mark attends miracles, by which they may be distinguished, and certainly known whether they be connected with truth, or falsehood [sic]; so no evidence can arise from any miracle for one or the other; and in consequence, the very argument drawn from miracles becomes abortive. From what has been observed, I think, the miracles said to be wrought since the second century, either prove too much, by proving popery to be true and true Christianity; or else they prove too little, viz. nothing at all . . . Upon the whole of this argument, I observe, that if miracles are admitted as proper evidences of the truth and divinity of doctrines or propositions; then they must be such evidences to all doctrines and propositions that have been promulged [sic] by the operator, at least, all that have been promulged [sic] by him after the exercise of such power. For as miraculous power is not more connected with, relative to, or dependent upon one doctrine or proposition, than upon another; therefore, it seems to follow, that if miracles are proper evidences of the truth and divinity of one doctrine or proposition which has been promulged [sic] by the operator, they, of course, become such evidences to all other doctrines or propositions that may be promulged [sic] by him. . . . The exercise of miraculous power does not shew, in the least, that the operator has more knowledge, or is more worthy to be trusted, after the exercise of it than before, or that he is more so than other men. If it should be said, that though every miracle-worker is fallible, and therefore is liable to err; yet it may well be expected, that he who is invested with miraculous or divine power, is invested with superior or divine knowledge also. . . . [M]iraculous power will not be trusted in human hands, because men shall not have it in their power to impose upon each other thereby. Besides, the miracles referred to were not considered to be a test of truth, at the time when they were wrought; seeing many parties and controversies took place among Christians, whilst (according to the history) the power of working miracles was mightily present with them; and yet miracles were not appealed to, nor were those controversies determined thereby, which might easily have been done, had miracles then been judged to have the nature and force of evidence as aforesaid. . . . Does each and every miracle that has been wrought, considered separately, or do all the miracles that have ever been wrought, considered collectively, prove that the books of the New Testament were wrought by the persons respectively whose names are now fixed to them; that the Deity dictated to and impressed upon their minds the subject matter contained in those books, effectually restraining each writer from mixing his own conceptions with what was thus dictated to him; that those books have been faithfully transmitted from their original copies down to this time, without any corruption, alteration, addition or diminution; and (to us the unlearned) that they have been justly rendered in our language? I say, do miracles prove these points? Surely not. And if miracles do not prove the forementioned points, then the question returns, how do they prove the books of the New Testament to be a divine revelation?" (pp. 240-248; emphasis in original)

Concerning the new heavens and new earth discussed by Peter (2 Peter 3: 13), Gill interprets the passage literally. He argues that the new heaven represents a new sky (or "airy heavens") cleansed of all impurities and troubles. Likewise, the new earth will be a paradisiacal dwelling place without thorns, thistles, or pain.

Excerpt (pages): "I. What are meant by the new heavens and the new earth . . . these are to be understood not in a figurative, but in a literal sense. 1. Not in a figurative sense, as of the gospel church state; Peter could never speak of the new heavens and new earth in this sense as future. The gospel church state, even in the first and purest ages of it, was not perfect as the state of things will be; but in the new heavens and the new earth, none but such as are perfectly righteous will dwell in the new Jerusalem-state; there will be no temple, no worship, in the manner that now is. Nor is it to be understood of the state of the Jews at the time of their conversion. This will be before the new heavens and new earth are formed, Rev. xix. 7,8. Nor of the spiritual reign of Christ, which will be in the present earth and not in the one [sic]. Nor of the heavenly state, or the ultimate glory; for these new heavens and earth are distinct from the third heaven, the seat of that. The camp of the saints, and the holy and beloved city, are represented as on earth, even at the end of a thousand years, Rev. xx, 9. II. The new heavens and new earth are to be understood in a literal sense; a literal sense is not to be departed from without necessity: the phrase, heaven and earth, is used by the apostle Peter frequently, and always literally in the sublunar world; by the new ones, can be meant no other. 1. The new heavens must be interpreted of the airy heavens, and of a new air in them; purged, purified, and refined by fire: no storms of hail, no stores of snow, no blustering storms and tempests, no coruscations and flashes of lightning, nor peals of thunder; but a pure, serene, and tranquil air, quite suited to the bodies of raised saints; the air will now be cleared of devils, the whole body of them will be cast into the abyss. 2. The new earth, will be an earth refined and renewed, and restored to its paradisiacal estate: as it was before the fall. It shall no more bring forth thorns and thistles, nor require labour and pains to cultivate it. It must be but reasonable, that since Christ hath redeemed his people from the curse of the law, being made a curse for them, that every degree of that curse should be removed; which, as yet is not, from the earth particularly; when the second Adam, and his seed, come to enjoy the earth alone, accordingly, There will be no more curse, Rev. xxi. 3. . . . The inhabitants of which are the palm bearing company in Rev. vii. 9. for this vision is synchronal, or cotemporary, with that of the new heavens and the new earth. These are the persons, and this will be the happy case of the inhabitants of the new heavens and the new earth. . . . They are called the holy city, the new Jerusalem; but not as in any state on this present earth. Mortal men, dwelling in houses of clay, would never be able to bear such a glory. The inhabitants of the new heavens and the new earth, are here described under the names of the holy city, by their descent from heaven, and by their freedom from all evils; God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes: there shall be no more night, either in a literal sense, or rather figurative, meaning no night of ignorance and error, of darkness and desertion, and of affliction of any kind; and they need no candle, neither artificial nor natural light; for the Lord God giveth them light, what vastly exceeds either; and they shall reign for ever and ever; first with Christ on the new earth, for a thousand years, . . . and then in heaven to all eternity." He emphasizes particularly the ancient use of the word "Cohen" which carried a double meaning of both religious priest and minister of a political sovereign.

Comment: In No Man Knows My History, Fawn Brodie points to this treatise as a foundation for Joseph's development of the Melchizedek Priesthood. Gray appears to be motivated by an ongoing controversy over the nature of the priesthood held by Christ; specifically what, as Psalm 110 describes, was the "parallel between the priesthood of Melchisedec and that of Messiah" [iii].

Excerpt (pages): "And we assert that Jesus did not usurp the honour of the priesthood; and stand ready to prove that he was called of God, as was Aaron, to that high dignity.--Produce your proof then, exclaims the Jews.--You have it, rejoins Paul, in the 110th psalm; where king David uses these words: 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.' Here is proof positive and indisputable. Messiah, the son of David, is a priest--a priest appointed by God--appointed with an oath--and after the order of Melchisedec. It is perfectly apparent that the apostle by this quotation proved all he undertook to prove, and something more; for he not only established the fact that Messiah must be a priest, but fixed the order of his priesthood. And alas! it is not the order of Aaron, but the order of Melchisedec. How is a Jew to endure this! . . . How was a Jew, I ask again, to be told that God wholly overlooking the divine priesthood of Levi, had gone back to Melchisedec, who was not even of the seed of Abraham, and taken his priesthood as a more noble pattern for the priesthood of Messiah. . . . Paul saw the peril of his situation, as the advocate of divine truth. He saw arrayed against him an host of prejudices inherent in the blood of Israelites, and consecrated into religious principles, by zeal for their ecclesiastical establishment." Nature of Source: An advertisement for the book offered the following: "The object of this work is to exhibit the Evidences, Doctrines, Morals and Institutions of Christianity, in a form adapted to the use of young Ministers, and Students in Divinity. It is hoped also that it may supply the desideratum of a BODY OF DIVINITY, adapted to the present state of theological literature, neither Calvinistic on the one hand nor Pelagian on the other." [from the frontispiece]

Comment: The quotation is taken from a lengthy (thirty page) treatment of different aspects of the trinity. Topics discussed include "God--The Trinity in Unity"; "Trinity--Scripture Testimony"; "Trinity--Preexistence of Christ"; and "Trinity--Jesus Christ the Jehovah of the Old Testament." Watson is contending against various Christian ideas, particularly the views of Socinians and Arians. The chapter contains pages of scriptural evidence [not quoted here] designed to support Watson's arguments.

Excerpt (pages): "By establishing, on Scriptural authority, the preexistence of our Lord, we take the first step in the demonstration of his absolute divinity. His preexistence, indeed, simply considered, does not evince his Godhead, and is not, therefore, a proof against the Arian hypothesis; but it destroys the Socinian notion, that he was a man only. For since no one contends for the preexistence of human souls, and if they did, the doctrine would be refuted by their own consciousness, it is clear, that if Christ existed before his incarnation, he is not a mere man, whatever his nature, by other arguments, may be proved to be. . . Whatever, therefore, the true nature of our Lord Jesus Christ may be, we have at least discovered from the plainest possible testimonies; testimonies which no criticism, and no unlicensed and paraphrastic comments, have been able to shake or to obscure, that he had an existence previous to his incarnation, and previous to the very 'foundation of the world.' If then we find that the same titles and works which are ascribed to him in the New Testament, are ascribed to a Divine Person in the Old, who is yet represented as distinct from God the Father, and especially to one who was to come into the world to fulfil the very offices which our Lord has actually fulfilled, we shall have obtained another step in this inquiry, and shall have exhibited lofty proof, not only of the preexistence of Christ, but also of his Divinity." Nature of Source: A theological dictionary containing definitions of religious terms and describing the major religious denominations. The volume under examination was the fifth American edition of a British publication.
Comment: This passage is taken from the entry on "Priest." It describes not only how priesthood power descended in the early church but moreover outlines how early Christian ministers believed that they inherited the ancient Jewish priesthood.
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "PRIEST, a person set apart for the performance of sacrifice, and other offices and ceremonies of religion. Before the promulgation of the law of Moses, the first-born of every family, the fathers, the prince, and the kings, were priests. Thus Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, Melchizedec, Job, Isaac, and Jacob, offered themselves their own sacrifices. Among the Israelites, after their departure from Egypt, the priesthood was confined to one tribe, and it consisted of three orders, the high-priest, priests and Levites. . . It has been much disputed, whether in the Christian church, there be any such officer as a priest, in the proper sense of the word. If the word priest be taken to denote a person commissioned by divine authority to offer up a real sacrifice to God, we may justly deny that there is a priest upon earth. Under the Gospel, there is but one priest, which is Christ; and but one sacrifice, that of the cross. The church of Rome, however, erroneously believe their priests to be empowered to offer up to the Divine Majesty a real proper sacrifice, as were the priests under the Old Testament.
Ecclesiastical history informs us, that, in the second century, some time after the reign of the emperor Adrian, when the Jews, by the second destruction of Jerusalem, were bereaved of all hopes of the restoration of their government to its former lustre, the notion that the ministers of the Christian church succeeded to the character and prerogatives of the Jewish priesthood, was industriously propagated by the Christian doctors; and that, in consequence, the bishops claimed a rank and character similar to that of the Jewish high-priest; the presbyters to that of the priests; and the deacons to that of the Levites." (pp.

Comment: This passage is taken from the entry on "Priest." This excerpt contains the differing views of the Lord's supper held by English clergy. The controversy centered on the question of whether the eucharist represented an actual sacrifice, a feast commemorating the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, or a mere commemoration of the death of Christ.
Researcher: Richard Kimball Excerpt (pages): "In the church of England, the word priest is retained to denote the second order in her hierarchy, but we believe with very different significations, according to the different opinions entertained of the Lord's supper. Some few of her divines, of great learning, and of undoubted protestantism, maintain that the Lord's supper is a commemorative and eucharistical sacrifice. These consider all who are authorised to administer that sacrament, as in the strictest sense priests. Others hold the Lord's supper to be a feast upon the one sacrifice, once offered on the cross; and these, too, must consider, themselves as clothed with some kind of priesthood. Great numbers, however, of the English clergy, perhaps the majority, agree with the church of Scotland, in maintaining that the Lord's supper is a rite of no other moral import, than the mere commemoration of the death of Christ. These cannot consider themselves as priests in the rigid sense of the word, but only as presbyters, of which the word priest is a contraction of the same import with elder." Excerpt (pages): "In the early ages of the world religion had not received that organization, which has distinguished religious society in subsequent periods. Prophets every age had: Adam, no doubt, was the first; Enoch, Noah, and others succeeded; for there could not be any such thing as religion, without a divine revelation: and by a procedure, the wisdom and goodness of which are equally apparent, God raised up from among men the instruments by which his will should be made known to their respective generations. But these were extraordinary characters, and are not known to have had any peculiar functions in the ordinary offices of religious worship. The faithful had no fixed teachers, to preach the truths, or doctrines of religion; no fixed priests, to present their sacrifices and offerings. Every pious man, no doubt, was ready to embrace such opportunities as might offer of instructing others, and presented his sacrifice in person.
We are not to imagine, however, that religion was, in the times alluded to, so entirely a private and personal concern, as to be wholly destitute of social character. It did always possess social character, and admitted the communion of saints: but that character was defined, not by ecclesiastical constitution, but by the natural arrangements of human society. Thus we find Job offering up sacrifices for his children, and Jethro, in communion with Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel, offering up sacrifice in the Israelitish camp. Such a course things would naturally take. For, as families and states are equally bound with individuals, to acknowledge the Supreme Being; so it is plain that those religious solemnities, by which such acknowledgment is made, must of right and necessity, (no divine constitution withstanding,) be conducted by the chief ruler; by the head of the family in the one case, and by the magistrate in the other." [pp. 31-33] them to understand and declare to others the will of God. Some think it uncertain whether the prophets always or even generally knew the time of the future events, or the meaning of what was communicated to them. . . . Others, on the contrary, maintain that there is no sufficient ground for this opinion, and that there is every reason to believe that the faculties of the prophets were purified, strengthened, and elevated, in a supernatural degree; that they understood distinctly the subject of prophetic revelation; and that the obscurity in which the prophetic writings are involved in our view, arises from our imperfect conceptions, and not from any want of clearness in the prophecies themselves."

Excerpt (pages): "I don't admire at the difficulties thou hast had to encounter, in regard to the mode of redemption generally held by professing Christians, as being effected by the death, or outward dying, of Jesus Christ upon the outward, wooden, cross. This, as it regards the redemption of the immortal soul from the bondage of sin, I consider a vulgar error, that came in with the apostasy from primitive Christianity. The redemption effected by this outward offering would only, according to the true analogy of things, be a redemption of the outward bodies. . . . Now I consider that the offering of the body of Jesus Christ, on the outward cross, applied only, as a matter of redemption, to the Israelites, redeeming them from the curse of that covenant, and the penalties attendant on every breach thereof. And this outward redemption was the top stone of that figurative dispensation, as by it that dispensation, with all its legal rites, and ceremonies, was abolished and done away. . . . And this outward redemption of the outward bodies of the Israelites, from the curses of their outward law, is a complete figure of the inward redemption of the soul from sin, by the life, or spiritual blood, of Christ, inwardly sprinkling our consciences, and enabling us to die to sin, as he died for sin, by which we are redeemed from dead works to serve the living God in newness of life, which makes the true Christian. . . . Neither do I believe that God sent Jesus Christ into the world, purposely to suffer death, in the way he did, any more than any all them [regarding other righteous men and women who had been persecuted and killed]. For I do not believe that God created any rational being, and sent him into the world to suffer death for other men, because they were wicked, and he was righteous." Publisher: Graves, for Delaplaine and Hellings

Library Location: Harold B. Lee Library, call no. MICROFICHE 080 Sh64a no. 20216

Nature of Source: After completing a commentary on the Old and New Testaments, the eminent Baptist divine John Gill turned his attention toward the creation of a "system" of divinity--a collection of the several doctrines of divine thought. Believing that "[e]vangelical truths are spread and scattered about in the sacred Scripture," Gill set out to "gather them together, and dispose of them in a regular, orderly method." This volume, abridged by William Staughton in 1810, comprises Gill's findings about the person and works of God, grace, worship, and ordinances.

Comment: In this passage, Gill discusses the events that are to precede and occur during the millennial reign of Christ. Events include the timing of the two resurrections, the subduing of the enemies of righteousness, and the judgment. Gill notes that the reign of Christ will occur on the earth rather than in a heavenly setting.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "I. That Christ will have a special, peculiar, glorious, and visible kingdom, in which he will reign personally on earth. 1. I call it a special, peculiar kingdom, different from the kingdom of nature, and from his spiritual kingdom. 2. It will be very glorious and visible; hence his appearing and kingdom are put together, 2 Tim. iv. 1. 3. This kingdom will be after all the enemies of Christ, and of his people, are removed out of the way. Antichrist will be destroyed; an angel, who is no other than Christ, will then personally descend to bind Satan and all his angels. 5. This kingdom of Christ will be bounded by two resurrections; by the first resurrection, or the resurrection of the just, at which it will begin; and by the second resurrection, or the resurrection of the wicked, at which it will end, or nearly. 6. This kingdom will be before the general judgment, especially for the wicked. John, after he had given an account of the former, Rev. xx. relates a vision of the latter. 7. This glorious, visible kingdom of Christ will be on earth, and not in heaven; and is distinct from the kingdom of heaven, or the ultimate glory. . . . In this glorious, visible, and personal reign of Christ, all the saints will have a share, they will reign with him, Rev. xx 4,6. . . . This will not be after the manner of his spiritual reign among his saints; that is a reign in them, this is a reigning with them, and of them with him. This will be a reign with Christ personally and visibly. It implies some kind of share with him in the glories of his kingdom, and supposes domination over all their enemies. . . . Satan will not be bound till Christ, the mighty Angel, descends from heaven to earth, which will not be till the end of the world." [pp. 429-433; emphasis in original]

Topics include, among others, the Holy Trinity, the antediluvian world, church government, and life eternal.
Comment: In speaking of the afterlife, Osterwald contends that there will be various degrees of glory in heaven, just as there are various levels of righteousness on the earth. Although all heavenly dwellers will be happy, some will receive a greater portion. The three-tiered heaven familiar to Mormons does not appear; in a passage with a familiar ring for Mormons, however, Osterwald compares one standard of glory to the sun and another to the stars.
Researcher: Richard Kimball
Excerpt (pages): "It is asked, whether there will be degrees of glory? The most of Divines answer in the affirmative, and they prove this, both from Scripture, as Matt. xxv. In the parable of the talents, 1 Cor. iii. 14, 15. 2 Cor. ix. 6. He which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly, and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully. Matt. xix. 28. Dan. xii. They that be wise, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever. And from reason, First. A special and higher degree of glory, can scarcely be denied to some certain persons, as the Apostles and Martyrs. Second. We can scarcely conceive, that a person who has spent the greatest part of his life in wickedness, and at length reformed a little before death, should obtain as high a degree of glory, as he who devotes the whole of his life time to piety, and has contributed much to the glory of God, and the salvation of men: God indeed rewards no person out of debt, but he has a respect to the state, life, and obedience of men. But though we grant, that there are degrees of glory, yet we are not to imagine, that they will be the less happy, upon that account, who have obtained a smaller portion; shall the sower or the husbandman be the less happy, or complain of his state, because he is not crowned with the same glory as the Apostle Paul. In a future world, there will be no room left for envy, all things shall be referred unto God, and God shall be praised in all and by all. On the other hand is objected, that passage, Matt. xx. 9, 10.
Concerning those labourers, who being hired about the eleventh hour, received as much wages, as those who had been hired early in the morning. But the meaning is, that the Gentiles who were to be called last, unto the divine covenant, should be partakers of the same grace, and the same benefits with the Jews, who had long since, and before the Gentiles, been called unto that covenant." (pp. 393-394)

Author: Charles Buck (1771-1815)
By writing a religious tract directed toward young church members, the Reverend Charles Buck (author of The Theological Dictionary) has sought to encourage and edify the "lambs" of Christ. According to the author, "I have endeavored to state the various duties in which they (young Christians) are to be engaged; to suggest suitable cautions against the dangers with which they are surrounded; and to encourage them in the midst of all those difficulties which so frequently arise" (Preface).

Comment: To speak peace to young minds concerned about sinning against the Holy Ghost, Buck analyzes the unpardonable sin and concludes that young Christians who remain sincere in their beliefs are unable to transgress to that degree.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "But what, perhaps, most of all affects you, is that you sometimes think you have sinned against the Holy Ghost. You read that this sin will never be forgiven; and that if we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins. But by this unpardonable sin you must understand is meant an absolute denial and total rejection of Christ and his gospel, by those who retain their obstinacy and malice to the end, and never repent. Such have no fears, no feelings of compunction, no desires whatever to believe in or receive the truth; and thus rejecting the only sacrifice for sins, of course, as the apostle says, there remains no other. Now how can this be your case? You, who see more excellency in Jesus than in any other object whatever? You, whose desire it is every day to glorify him, and unreservedly devote yourself to him? You, who if you were to be asked what is your petition, and what is your request, could say, 'Lord, that I may know, and fear, and love thee; that thou mayest be mine; and that my body, soul, and spirit, may be consecrated to thy praise; that while I live, I may live to thee, and when I die I may dwell for ever with thee.' No hypocrite, no one that is deceived, no one that is under the influence of the powers of darkness, can ever possess such feelings, experience such desires, or sincerely express such ardent wishes to be with and to be like the Saviour." Comment: In this excerpt, Osterwald describes the current state of thought concerning the concept of unpardonable sin. Excerpt (pages): "Besides, Sin is divided, into remissible, and irremissible, or the Sin against the Holy Ghost. But divines differ, in explaining the nature of this sin; some assert, that it consists in apostacy, attended with a detestation of the truth when known, and opposition to it, and all this contrary to conscience, and from deliberate malice. Others affirm, that it consists in final impenitence, and others in despair [sic]; but these things are uncertain, obscure, and of no utility. They are uncertain, since it can scarcely be defined, wherein this Sin consists, for neither apostates, nor such as sin through deliberate malice, or persecute the truth, can be said to sin irremissibly. Unprofitable, as this doctrine can be of no use, nor can it be applied to any man. All Divines acknowledge, that no person ought to believe, that he has been guilty of this sin, as also that it ought not to be said of any one, that he has been guilty of it. . . . Men of learning have acted with little prudence, who have treated of the sin against the Holy Ghost, in their sermons or writings. Excerpt (pages): "This passage of scripture, viz. Heb. vi. 4, 5, 6;--and that other passage, chap. x.29 have nothing to do with the question, whether a regenerated person may fall from a state of grace. The question to which these passages relate, is this: whether a person, who has heard the gospel, and has been enlightened by the Spirit of God to perceive its truth, and adopt it with joy, may, after all, renounce the whole system of divine truth, and spurn the idea of salvation by the blood of Jesus. The scriptures certainly speak of this as a possible case; and too many instances of the fact have occurred, to admit any doubt about the existence of such apostates. It is an apostasy, known to, and gloried in, by the apostates themselves: an apostasy, which the Christian church can see and know, else the general commandment to pray for all men, had never been limited by a command not to pray for such men: finally, it is an apostasy from which there is no recovery. We sometimes hear Christians, in their prayers, confessing that they 'have crucified the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.'--'That they have trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant with which he was sanctified an unholy thing.' We may not charge such persons with any error in idea; but their expressions are in the highest degree improper: for, they confess a sin, which no Christian, at any period of his life, ever committed; nay, one which no professor of Christianity has committed: they confess themselves guilty of the unpardonable sin. Those dreadful terms are appropriated by the divine Spirit to the most dreadful instance of human guilt: the association between the phraseology and the crime should never be dissolved. The highest effect of the malignity of sin, and the most unrelenting wrath displayed by God in his government over man, should stand distinct from ordinary crimes and punishments. Two important ends would be promoted by this. The man enlightened in the doctrine of salvation through the blood of Jesus, would be put on his guard against the sophistries and corruptions which would lead him from one step of backsliding to another, till he had 'trampled under foot the Son of God.' On the other hand, tender consciences would be delivered from needless terrors. A mind only partially instructed in the doctrine of the gospel, and disordered by the intense operations of a conscience deeply convicted of sin, and by the fiery darts of the evil one, is apt to aggravate all things, and impute to itself, not only its real guiltiness, but a guilt from which it is free, that of the sin unto death. Let the nature of that sin be distinctly known. Surely every Christian can lay his hand on his breast, and looking up to the searcher of hearts, can say, I do not 'count the blood of Jesus an unholy thing;' I do not tread the Son of God contemptuously under foot.' I do know that his blood is precious blood.' . . . The priesthood of Jesus, as distinguished from that of Aaron, is his [Paul's] theme; and he tells them [Jews] that they must cleave to that priesthood and its atonement,--or they are lost: from that priesthood, now that they had been enlightened in its nature, should they apostatise, though no farther than to the Aaronic priesthood, repentance is impossible; and mercy no more." [footnote, pp. 17-19; p. 20]

Comment: This passage comes from the entry on "Sin" wherein the "sin unto death" is explained. The author initially offers a legalistic interpretation (perhaps unforgivable sins had been outlawed in the Jewish code) but concludes that an unpardonable sin could scarcely be committed by modern Christians.

Researcher: Richard Kimball

Excerpt (pages): "The sin not unto death, and the sin unto death, (1 John v. 16,) have been variously interpreted. As there are offences under human governments which are capital, involving the certain penalty of death without the hope of pardon, so under the divine government there are sins of such malignity and aggravation, evincing an impious and unalterable determination to reject the offered mercy of God, that we have little, if any ground, for the prayer of faith, or even for the hope that the offender may be forgiven. It seems difficult to suppose a case, however, in the existing state of God's government, in which the character of a sin can be so determined by any human tribunal, as to make him who commits it no longer a subject of prayer. (John iii. 15. Acts xvii. 30.
2 Pet. iii. 9.) Some have supposed that exclusive reference is had to a distinction in the Jewish law between offences capital and not capital; or to the civil law of some particular place, by which some offences were punishable with death, without the possibility of pardon. These were sins unto death, for no entreaty availed to avert the punishment. But there were other capital cases in which the law authorized a commutation of punishment, if the circumstances justified it. These were sins not unto death; for the powerful intercession of friends for the offender might save him. Whether what is called the unpardonable sin (Matt. xii. 31, 32) can be committed except by such as were witnesses of the mighty works wrought by Christ, and by his apostles through the power of the Holy Ghost, is considered doubtful by many. From the connexion [sic] of the above cited passage from Matthew we have a very explicit illustration of one species of this sin; and perhaps the unpardonable sin is the same with the sin unto death."  (p. 581; emphasis in original)

Orson Hyde and a Land for the Jews: The Gathering of Israel Among Mormons, Jews, and Christians in the 1840's

Summer 2002

Upon his arrival in the Holy Land, travel worn and weary, Orson Hyde no doubt resembled fellow pilgrims from America in the 1840's. The majority of his countrymen who visited the Holy Land were "serious young men who claimed that their main motive for travel was the pious hope of hastening the millennium."\(^1\) Hyde, who would dedicate the land to the gathering of the Jews during his 1841 visit, certainly fit in this category. Many of his fellow travelers published accounts of their time in the Holy Land to finance their journeys. And so did Hyde. A Voice From Jerusalem, a collection of his letters to Joseph Smith and members of the brethren, was published to fund his return trip and bears many similarities to contemporaneous accounts by other pious Americans. Yet Hyde was more daring than many, claiming to have been sent on a mission from God. According to his account, he was commanded in a vision in March of 1840 to warn both Jews and Gentiles about the need for the Jews to gather.\(^2\) One month later, during the April 1840 conference of the Church at Nauvoo, the Mormon apostle was assigned to travel to Jerusalem and there dedicate the land to the return of the house of Israel.\(^3\) Like other Mormon missionaries at the time, Hyde commenced his journey, which took two and a half years, without financial resources.\(^4\) As he traveled, he spoke to audiences and published tracts to raise money and further the missionary work of the church. In Germany, he undertook the study of the German language and within eight days, wrote Joseph Smith that he could "speak and write the German considerable already." Upon his return through Germany, at the end of his trip, he wrote and published a 115-page book in German entitled A Cry From The Wilderness, which sketched out of the "origin and doctrines" of the Mormon church.\(^5\) Travel in the Middle East was a risky business in the 1840s, and while sailing on the Mediterranean Sea from Smyrna to Beirut, Hyde's ship became becalmed and ran out of provisions. Hyde was reduced to eating snails that he gathered on the rocks of several uninhabited islands. The only trouble, he wrote, was that he "could not get enough of them." Hyde finally reached Beirut, only to find a "terrible battle" being fought outside of the city. He wrote there that "thefts, murders, and robberies are taking place almost continually."\(^6\) Then, while on a ship from Beirut to Jaffa, Hyde as well as all other members of the ship noticed "a very bright glittering sword...in the heavens" and a hand which "stretched itself out and took hold of the hilt of the sword." The Arabs on the ship believed it to be a manifestation of Allah, but Hyde writes in a letter to Parley Pratt: "I mention this because you know there is a commandment to me which says: 'Unto you it shall be given to know the signs of the times, and the sign of the coming of the Son of Man.'

Perhaps for this reason, Hyde's writings are full of observations about the current state of the Jews and the interest of Jews and Gentiles in the gathering. He made several prophecies and asserted that there was intense interest among both Jews and Christians regarding the restoration of Palestine to the Jews. Although his observations resembled those made by others at the time, his attitude toward the Jews and his dedication of the land for the gathering are unusual. In retrospect, Hyde seems to have been an acute political observer as well as having been inspired by God. As he recounts, at the time of his dedication of Jerusalem in 1841, the scene was already set, the world prepared for the gathering to begin in earnest.

Interest in the Holy Land among Christians

Although the Holy Land had always fascinated Bible-saturated Americans, pilgrims and travelers from America did not begin to visit Palestine until the 1820's. Before that time, Americans were too preoccupied with settling an untamed wilderness and establishing their new country. From the 1820s on, however, a steady stream of accounts by travelers to the Holy Land poured off American presses and appeared on the pages of American periodicals. As a result of the popularity of their publications, the travelers had a wider influence than their numbers may reflect. In 1843-1844, for instance, two years after Hyde's journey, only twelve Americans are known to have visited the Holy Land, yet John Lloyd Stephens' 1837 Incidents of Travel sold 21,000 copies and earned its author $25,000.

Nearly all American travelers to the Holy Land in the first half of the 19th century viewed Palestine through the lens of scripture. What they described and found significant were places mentioned in the Old and New Testament. Hyde also likened much of what he saw in Israel, both people and places, to ancient scripture. He writes, for instance, "The customs and manners of the people of the east are so similar to what they were in the days of the Savior that almost everything which the traveler beholds is a standing illustration of some portion of scripture." Seeing two women grinding wheat at a hand mill reminded him of a passage from Isaiah. When he visited the pool of Bethesda, he noted that there would have been plenty of water to "immerse all Jerusalem in a day." He saw this as evidence that early Christians in the New Testament practiced baptism by immersion. Similarly, one of the first American missionaries to the Holy Land, Pliny Fisk, said in 1819, speaking of Palestine; "It was in the wilderness of Judea, that John came to announce the Savior's approach and prepare his way before him. In one of these villages Jesus was born; on one of these plains the shepherds were watching their flocks, when a choir of angels came from heaven."

At the same time, many American visitors were disappointed by the barrenness and poverty of the land of Israel. They remarked on what they perceived as destitution and filthiness among both Jews and Arabs. An 1843 travelogue by the American reverend Stephen Olin, entitled Travels in Egypt, Arabia Petraea and the Holy Land, notes that the Jews in Jerusalem occupy "the most miserable and filthy part of the city, redolent of bad odours" and that many of the houses in Jerusalem "are in a dilapidated and ruinous state...One passes from court to court...[looking] into a succession of uninhabited and uninhabitable rooms, full, or half full, of rubbish and filth."
Also reflected in the travelers' accounts is the belief of the majority of Americans that the Jews would one day be literally restored to the Holy Land. This restoration - either preceded or followed by a general conversion of the Jews - would then help usher in the millennium. This belief stemmed from the radical change in Biblical interpretation brought about by the Protestant Reformation. While previous Christian eschatology generally ignored the idea of a Jewish restoration, the Reformation's emphasis on making the Bible available in the vernacular to lay worshipers led to a more literal reading of prophecies about the Jewish gathering.

English Puritans carried this more literal reading of biblical prophecies with them when they crossed the seas to settle in the new land of America. Their descendants in America shared their forbearers' fascination with all things pertaining to Israel. Americans learned the Hebrew language in their Universities, named a number of American towns and cities after places in the Old Testament, and used rhetoric and images from the Bible in their everyday conversations, religious sermons, literature, and political discussions.

This strong biblical emphasis in America is reflected in the writings of Edward Robinson, a 19th century archaeologist and perhaps the most famous American traveler to Palestine in the 1840's. In a newspaper serial of his 1841 book, Biblical Researches in Palestine, Robinson writes romantically that the scenes in Israel seemed familiar to him: "From the earliest childhood I had read of and studied the localities of this sacred spot; now I beheld them with my own eyes; and they all seemed familiar to me, as if the realization of a former dream." Many Americans, whether or not they traveled to the Holy Land, had an intense interest in this magical place of ancient lore as a result of their grounding in scripture and writings and talks by travelers such as Robinson markedly increased that interest.

This fascination with the Holy Land also led Americans to turn their thoughts to the Jews, who remained scattered throughout the world in the Diaspora begun in the first centuries of the Common Era.

Just as their interest in the Holy Land was rooted in scripture, the American interest in the Jews' return remained largely spiritual rather than political in nature. For instance, while John Adams, the second president of the United States, believed that a Jewish state should be established in Palestine, he did not incorporate this idea into American policy. Rather than dwelling on the political implications of such a state, Americans focused on the gathering as a sign of the millennium. The Jews were seen as instrumental in converting the earth, as Baptist minister Isaac Taylor Hinton wrote in 1840: "The restoration of the Jews...will probably be the main instrumentality for healing the divisions of the church, as well as for successfully disseminating the gospel among the heathen."

Mormons and the Gathering
The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints shared this largely spiritual outlook about the gathering of Israel. Early members tended, however, to focus more on the gathering of Saints to Zion on the American continent, rather than on the gathering of the Jews to Palestine. Despite this focus on the American gathering, the prophet Joseph Smith proclaimed, as part of his dedication of the Kirtland Temple on 27 March 1836: "Jerusalem, from this hour, may begin to be redeemed" (D&C 109:62). One week later, on 3 April 1836, "the Lord, along with the ancient prophet Moses, appeared to Joseph
Smith and Oliver Cowdery and 'committed unto [them] the keys of the gathering of Israel from the four parts of the earth.' (D&C 110:11)\textsuperscript{21}

Orson Hyde's journey to Jerusalem seems to be the first concrete action taken by the Mormon church to help facilitate the gathering. Hyde himself is extremely cognizant throughout his mission of the keys that had been handed down and the divine nature of his mission. In order to fulfill the Lord's mandate to declare unto the Jews that the time of their gathering was at hand, in the course of his journey Hyde spoke about the gathering with Jews in Rotterdam and Jerusalem and sent letters declaring his purpose to the chief rabbi of London and the Jews of Constantinople.\textsuperscript{22} There is no evidence that these communications had an effect on the recipients, but they do seem to have had an effect on Hyde, leading him to state on several occasions that the Lord was preparing the Jews for the return. In a letter to Parley P. Pratt following his visit to Jerusalem, for instance, Hyde wrote: "I have found many Jews who listened with intense interest. The idea of the Jews being restored to Palestine is gaining ground in Europe almost every day...Many of the Jews who are old go to this place to die, and many are coming from Europe into this Eastern world. The great wheel is unquestionably in motion, and the word of the Almighty has declared that it shall roll."\textsuperscript{23}

Yet while Hyde did find interest among the Jews, it seems that his journeys and the revelation he received from God also showed him that Gentiles would take the lead in gathering Israel. On July 7 1840, before traveling through Europe and visiting Jerusalem, Hyde had written in a report to the prophet Joseph in Franklin, Ohio: "The Jews are gathering; and have issued orders, or a circular, and universal proclamation for their brethren, in all the world, to return to Palestine, for the land is ready for their reception. 'But there is none to guide her among all the sons whom she hath brought up...'-See Isaiah 51:18...As Jerusalem has no sons to take her by the hand and lead her among all the number whom she hath brought forth, Bro. Page and myself feel that we ought to hurry along and take her by the hand; for we are her sons but the Gentiles have brought us up."\textsuperscript{24} This statement seems slightly contradictory, first saying that the Jews had issued orders to gather, and then saying that there were none among the Jews who could take the lead at that time in facilitating the gathering. The orders of which Hyde speaks of were issued by a group of German Jews in Jerusalem, and the main purpose of their circular seems to be to solicit money for the rebuilding of their synagogue in Jerusalem. Yet the circular does state that due to the more lenient policies toward Jews of the Egyptians, who occupied Palestine in the decade of the 1830s, the Jewish areas of the city were being restored to the possession of the Jews and rebuilt.\textsuperscript{25} Thus although Hyde may have believed that the Jewish circular was more of a call to gather than it actually was, it does illustrate his statement that it was the Gentiles, in this case the Egyptian ruler, rather than the Jews, who would take action at that time to gather Israel. For instance, a much more widely-published circular of the time, issued by a gentile, Henry Innes, the British Secretary of the Admiralty, called on Protestant European leaders to help the Jews return to Palestine.\textsuperscript{26} This circular was mentioned in the publication of the English Saints, the Millennial Star, where it seems likely Hyde may have learned of it.\textsuperscript{27}

Yet while the Jews may not have been preparing en masse to return to Israel in the 1840s, the myth of their exile and redemption was a major theme in their culture and education. Throughout their lengthy Diaspora, they remained conscious that their true and ultimate home was in Palestine. At the same time, the traditional Jewish doctrine was that their gathering would be on God's timetable, not their own, and that they needed to be patient. The grand rabbi De Cologne of France stated in 1825: "According to our dogmas, God alone knows the epoch of the Israelitish restoration; that he alone will make it known to the whole universe, by signs entirely unequivocal; and that every attempt on our part, to re-assemble with any political-national design, is forbidden, as an act of high treason against the Divine Majesty." At the same time, however, Jews were habituated to "a cyclical granting and withdrawal of the gifts of territory and sovereignty." Therefore, in the common mind, the return to Israel was not always relegated to a distant future that only God could ordain, leading to ambivalence in this area.

The effects of the Enlightenment and the Emancipation of Western European Jews as well as increased immigration to the United States made the 19th century a period of great change for the Jews. Beginning with the French Revolution of 1789, as European Jews began to be offered civil equality, many Jews were faced with maintaining their traditional separation or beginning to integrate into the countries in which they lived. To gain political rights, a number of Western Jews asserted that the Jews were not a separate nation but purely a religious body and denied any intention or desire to return to Israel. The more traditional Eastern European Jews, however, who remained largely unemancipated, did not renounce their eventual return. At the same time, a small number of Jewish forerunners to the Zionist movement, who opposed emancipation and were concerned about the effect of integration upon western European Jewry, began to advocate a return to Israel.

As Hyde observed, in the early and mid-19th century, there was a relative increase in the rate of resettlement of Jews in Palestine. Although there was much greater growth later in the 19th and 20th centuries, "The Jewish population growth between 1835 and 1840 represents the greatest proportional growth rate [in Jerusalem] during any five-year period in modern history." A number of the new Jewish settlers were political refugees from North Africa and Southeastern Europe. The Jewish community in Palestine remained small, but now larger than before, it presented economic and legal problems. While this slight increase in immigration was largely on an individual level, several English and American societies were founded in the first half of the 19th century to raise money for Jews in the Holy Land.

Yet despite their support for such societies, most American Jews in the first half of the 19th century were content where they were. They found far more freedom and safety in America than in the European ghettos that many had immigrated from. Scholar Peter Grose explains: "While centuries of persecution had strengthened the mystical bond of the Jewish Diaspora to their Holy Land, the opportunities offered by 19th century America broke it." Although they were largely an exception, a few prominent American Jews, did publicly endorsed the idea of the return at this time. American Jew Mordecai Noah, for instance, attempted in the early 1820s to establish a Jewish colony on Grand Island, New York, which he claimed would be an eventual launching ground for the Jewish return to Israel. While the colony was unsuccessful, Noah remained enamored with the idea of the return and in a speech in 1844, echoed the thoughts of many Christians in saying that the way was being prepared for the gathering, indicating as signs "comotions in the State and division in the Church; new theories put forth, new hopes excited, new promises made; and the political events in Syria, Egypt, Turkey, and Russia." A few other prominent Jews advocated the return, including Rabbi Rice, an orthodox rabbi in mid-19th century America, who spoke out against Jewish assimilation in America and stressed that the commandments could only be completely fulfilled in Israel, concluding that Jews should leave America and return to Israel.

The English role in the Gathering

Despite this sporadic interest among Jews and slight increase in immigration to Israel, in the 1840's England was the active agent in the return of the Jews, as Hyde rightly saw. He prophesied in A Voice From Jerusalem: "It was by political power and influence that the Jewish nation was broken down, and her subjects dispersed abroad; and I will here hazard the opinion, that by political power and influence they will be gathered and built up; and, further, that England is destined, in the wisdom and economy of heaven, to stretch forth the arm of political power, and advance in the front ranks of this glorious enterprise." 41 This went against the idea among certain Americans that America - the Promised Land - would be the nation to help. Yet it was in line with political realities at the time. The possibility of England giving aid to Jews in gathering to Israel was already being discussed in high political circles in England and some actions had been taken. One reason for this interest seems to be the moral atmosphere created by the Church of England in favor of Jewish conversion and restoration. 42 The political debate over the emancipation of the Jews in England also made the issue of the Jews a pressing political issue in England at the time. In addition, Britain's vast empire and naval power enabled English leaders to wield influence on the world scene.

In 1839, for instance, the prominent English Jew, Sir Moses Montefiore, negotiated with Mehmet Ali, who had extended his Viceroyalty of Egypt to include Palestine in the 1830's, for concessions to Jews in the Holy Land for agricultural settlements. However, Britain, for diplomatic reasons, persuaded Ali to vacate the occupied territories and return them to the Ottoman Empire and Montefiore's plans could not be carried out. 43 But before Ali was dislodged, Tory politician Lord Shaftesbury made a plea in The Quarterly Review for Jewish settlement in Palestine under the protection of the major powers. 44 In addition, Palmerston, the British foreign secretary, instructed the British ambassador in 1840 to acquaint the Ottomans with the benefits of encouraging Jewish settlement. His main concern was establishing a British presence in the area, but his proposal coincided with the goals of Christian advocates of Jewish restoration. 45

Hyde seems to be cognizant of many of these events, due perhaps to his three and a half months in England while traveling to the Holy Land. Yet at the beginning of his journey, even before he arrived in England, he wrote in a report to the prophet Joseph Smith: "I am informed that both England and Rusia [sic], have extended protection to the Jews in Palestine; and proffer to aid them in their return." 46 Indeed, two years earlier, in 1838, Britain had been the first European nation to establish a consulate in Jerusalem. At the direction of British Foreign Secretary Palmerston, in 1839 the English consulate extended protection to Jews who had lost the protection of the countries of their origin upon their immigration to Palestine. 47 Although other western countries also established consulates in Palestine in the 1840s and '50s, according to scholar David Vitale, "The British were both the most influential of all foreign representatives and, on the whole, the most helpful to the Jews." 48
Despite the accuracy of his prophesies, Hyde was not the only person saying that England would play a role. After the 1805 Battle of Trafalgar, in which England gained almost unchallenged control of the seas, people often linked Britain with the maritime nation that Isaiah prophesied would help gather Israel (Isaiah 18).

America and the Gathering

In contrast to England, America, still a young nation, had little political power in the Middle East in the 1840's. Her missionary efforts in Palestine also struggled. The first of the American missionary societies, the American Board of Commissions for Foreign Missions, appointed in 1818 two missionaries to go the Near East. The mission at Jerusalem was not successful, yielding only a handful of converts, and in 1844 it was decided to close the Jerusalem station. From that time until the end of the 19th century, Americans left missionary work in Palestine largely to the British. Hyde experienced the weakness of the American missionary effort first hand, writing that when he asked the American missionaries in Jerusalem to introduce him to some of the principle Jews in Jerusalem, they made hemming sounds and then "observed that Mr. Johns, the English Consul, might be the most proper man to grant me the desired favor."

Despite America's lack of political heft on the world scene, a number of Americans believed their nation had a unique role in restoring the House of Israel. Identifying the Native Americans as the Lost Tribes, for instance, Americans believed they had a unique role in the conversion of these scattered members of the House of Israel. Some, such as Ethan Smith in A View of the Hebrews, went so far as to say that the biblical prophecies that the restoration of Israel will come from "far countries...from isles afar" showed that America would play a role in restoring the ten tribes to Jerusalem.

According to scholar Moshe Davis, many early American historical sources, both Christian and Jewish, "reveal almost identical language, symbols and manner of discourse regarding the Jewish Restoration in the Holy Land....In this literature, the young American nation is admonished to help bring about the Restoration of the Jews, as part of its responsibilities to itself and to the world." For instance, Protestant clergyman, Rev. John McDonald, linked what he believed to be America's role in restoring the Jews with that of Cyrus, the gentile ruler who rebuilt the temple of the Jews in Jerusalem. In addition, prominent Jew Mordecai Noah said in an 1844 discourse: "Where can we plead the cause of independence for the children of Israel with greater confidence than in the cradle of American liberty? Here we can unfurl the standard, and seventeen millions of people will say, '...go forth and repossess the land of your fathers.'"

Hyde echoes this Cyrus theme in his dedicatory prayer: "Thou, O Lord, did once move upon the heart of Cyrus to shew favour unto Jerusalem and her children. Do thou now also be pleased to inspire the hearts of kings and the powers of the earth to look with a friendly eye towards this place and with a desire to see thy righteous purposes executed in relation thereto." However, Hyde did not see America as aiding in gathering. He quoted biblical prophesy as saying that kings, not presidents, would play a role in restoring the Jews to Palestine. Instead, Hyde gave America the unique role in Mormon theology as the site of the New Jerusalem. While Rev. John McDonald used the metaphor in Isaiah 18 of eagle's wings shadowing to identify America as the nation that would help gather the Jews in the Last Days, Hyde used the same image to illustrate America's role as Zion, or the New Jerusalem: "But on the land of Joseph, far in the west, where the spread eagle of America floats in the breeze and shadows the land...shall Zion rear her stately temples and stretch forth the curtains of her habitation."\(^{59}\) Hyde was not alone in identifying England as the Cyrus figure that would restore the Jews to Israel. Yet unlike previous commentators, Hyde gave a role of helping to usher in the millennium to both America and England: America as the site of the New Jerusalem and the gathering place of Mormons in the 19th century and England as the political power that would aid in the restoration of the Jews.

Despite the novelty and boldness of some of Hyde's writings and ideas, many of his ideas were similar to others of his time, and to a contemporary observer it no doubt seemed that he was just another pilgrim to the Holy Land. Even to his fellow Mormons, Hyde's mission took secondary importance to their own efforts to establish Zion in America. In addition, it does not seem that Hyde significantly influenced the Jews or Gentiles that he met along his journey. Yet Hyde did not undertake his two and a half year journey believing that his efforts would be in vain. He felt that he was calling down the powers of heaven to make the land fruitful once again and restore Israel, stating in his dedicatory prayer: "Let [the land] again flow with plenty to feed the returning prodigals...Incline [the Jews] to gather in upon this land according to thy word. Let them come like clouds and like doves to their windows."\(^{60}\) Joseph Smith also saw Hyde's dedication as an event of vast importance, writing in a letter to Hyde: "Although [your mission] appears great at present, yet you have but just begun to realize the greatness, the extent and glory of the same."\(^{61}\) Hyde was indeed correct in his statements that the world was already being prepared for the return of the Jews, and there was interest among both Jews and Gentiles regarding the gathering. As he stated, England was playing and would continue to play the crucial role in facilitating the Jews' return. And in the years after his mission, a great change did begin to take place in the Holy Land. Even as soon as a decade after Hyde's mission, in 1852, famed archaeologist Edward Robinson found Jerusalem greatly changed from his previous visit fourteen years earlier. He stated that the city was being rebuilt, civil and political reforms had been introduced, and the poverty of its inhabitants was lessening.\(^{62}\) Although Hyde did no more than call on the powers of heaven, it seems that in the end, his petition was granted.

Comment: Out of the many different criticisms being leveled at Mormons at this time, the author of this article chooses to criticize Mormonism for its "enthusiasms." Yet at the time of Joseph Smith's First Vision, a large number of revivals were occurring throughout the country and this same newspaper also contains several accounts of revivals occurring in the Boston area in 1842. It seems that Mormons would have been less prone to this accusation than certain other religions whose revivals contained shouting, loud singing, and dramatic evidences of God's grace such as speaking in tongues, etc... However, at the same time that the author criticizes Mormons for their enthusiasm and revelations, he also seems to look down on "learning" about spiritual truth, probably because he believed that all spiritual truth had already been made manifest and the heavens were closed in regards to future revelations. It was interesting to me that the author said that Mormonism had retained a considerable portion of evangelical truth since he seems largely negative about Mormonism. Was this a common sentiment among those of other faiths at this point in time? Also interesting was his comment that Christians should be established with grace instead of running after new truth, as it seems to show a belief along Calvinist lines that grace is the only thing that can save us, and that knowledge and works are not salvific.

Excerpt (pages): "It appears, by recent accounts, that the Mormons are making converts in Illinois, and that they have purchased twenty thousand acres of land, and laid out a city, which they call Nauvoo. They have also commenced the publication of a paper, called "The Times and Seasons." A Mr. John Correll, recently a member of the Legislature of Missouri, has published a book, giving an account of his conversion to Mormonism and his reasons for [joining?] them. It is singular that this imposture, since having so many times been deceived and exposed, should still gain proselytes. It shows, however, what an exuberant ___ the human mind is, in its depraved state, for the growth of error and delusion. Nothing can be so absurd, of connected with enthusiasm and apparent piety, to be received by the mind that is a stranger to the truth as it is in Jesus. Mormonism, however, is rendered much more specious and dangerous, for having retained a considerable portion of evangelical truth. This, mixed with the idea of Divine impulse and new revelations, together with some extravagant [notions?] about coming events, is sufficient to carry them to any extreme of enthusiasm. And it is probably the effects of enthusiastic excitement, rather than the conviction of the understanding, that leads so many to embrace it. Christians should be established with grace, and not be running after every "La here" and "La there," and if they give way to the propensity to learn every new thing that comes along then it is not at all surprising, that the Lord should lead them to fall into grievous error and continue in it."

Comment: The author of this article cites Old and New Testament scriptures (primarily Zechariah) to establish that the Jews will be gathered to Palestine and settle there in the Last Days. He seems to see this as a sign of the millennium and writes that once the Jews gather to Jerusalem, they will become converted to Christ and will then undertake a huge missionary effort to bring the gospel of Christ to the world. Rather than passively waiting for this to happen, the writer urges Christians to hold a convention to bring this about and to take measures such as buying Palestine from the Ottoman Empire. Thus, he advocates Christians taking an active part in preparing for the millennium. The Book of Mormon also prophesies that the Jews will begin to believe in Christ and will gather to Israel in the Last Days (2 Nephi 30:7, 2 Nephi 25:16-17). The idea of actively gathering to "Zion" is evident in early Mormon history although their Zion was "the New Jerusalem" in Missouri. Yet while the gathering to the New Jerusalem is more prominent in early church discourse and publications, early Mormons cited the Book of Mormon to say that Jews would gather to Palestine in the Last Days. According to Grant Underwood, early church leaders debated the issue of whether Jews would gather in unbelief or would be converted and then gather. In addition, there were two interesting phrases used to describe the Jews in this article that are often associated with Mormonism: "a peculiar people" and characterized by the phrase "Holiness to the Lord."

Excerpt (pages): p.5: "Christians in common with Jews, believe in the inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures. In these Holy Oracles, the return of the children of Abraham to their own inheritance in the land of Palestine is clearly predicted. Three of the ancient prophets lived and prophesied after the Babylonian captivity. These were Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. After the captivity in Babylon, God mentions another dispersion of the Jews in this remarkable language; "I scattered them with a whirlwind among all the nations whom they knew not: Thus the land was desolate after them." (Zech. 7:14) That they are thus scattered none can doubt. Of their restoration, which is yet future, much is also predicted by the prophets. What is said of their restoration relates to their return to their own land, to the outpouring of God's Spirit upon them at Jerusalem, and to their instrumentality in bringing the Gentile nations into the Messiah's kingdom. Of the return of the Jews to their own land, we find the following and much similar language used by the prophets: "Thus saith the Lord, There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem: -- and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof. Behold I will save my people from the east country: and I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem...." (Zech. 8:4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 22, and 14: 11, 15. and 12:6. and 10:6.) "Predictions to the same effect are also recorded in the New Testament. It is affirmed that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." (Luke 21:24)...it is evident from the passage that Jerusalem will one day cease to be "trodden down of the Gentiles."

That the literal meaning of the language of the preceding predictions, intimates a literal return of the Jews to their own land, can scarcely be doubted by any reflecting person. The prophecies relating to their captivities and dispersions, and to the destruction of their city and temple, have all been literally fulfilled. We may therefore reasonably conclude that the predictions relating to their return to their own land will also be literally fulfilled...They are and ever have been a distinct people. They have always dwelt alone. They have not commingled with the nations of the earth. That the hand of God has always been among them, is manifest. They are and have been a "peculiar people." Their nationality remains: though they have no king, no prince, no distinct code of civil laws, no country, and no national existence acknowledged by human governments. They, almost to a man, earnestly desire to return to "the city of their fathers' sepulchers." They wish to die and be buried in Palestine. It is manifest therefore from the language of prophecy and from other considerations that the Jews, as a nation, will yet possess their own country.

..."Holiness unto the Lord" will then also be a characteristic mark of the Jewish people (see Zech. 8:8 and 12:8, 9, 10 and 14:20,21.)

...That the Jews shall as a people, go forth from Palestine, in the capacity of Missionaries to the Gentiles, appears from such language as the following: "As ye were a curse among the heathen, 1) house of Judah and house of Israel, so will I save you and ye shall be a blessing..." (Zech 8:13, 23 and 9:10 and 14:8) It is manifest from this prophetic language that the Jewish nation shall yet be a blessing to the world. May not Jerusalem yet become a center from which multitudes of God's own chosen people who are yet "beloved for the father's sake," shall go forth among the nations of the earth to bring men into the Redeemer's Kingdom. For this they seem to have long been preparing. They are, and for more than seventeen centuries have been scattered through every nation of the globe. They are acquainted with the languages, modes of thinking, habits, manners and modes of life of all the Gentiles nations. They are inured to every climate. In a word, they are natives of every portion of the world. As a people they revere the Old Testament Scriptures. When the Holy Spirit is poured down upon them as a nation, and they mourn greatly "in Jerusalem" for their sins, and especially for him "whom they have pierced," (Zech. 12:10,11) how exceedingly well prepared to proclaim to every nation, the glad tidings of our Saviour's love. But the Jew is an out-cast. His beloved city is a scene of desolation. Mahometanism sways its iron scepter over his land. The inheritance of his father Abram is possessed by strangers. This ought not so to remain. The Jewish nation cannot at present return to their own country. Its sovereignty is now and has long been held by the Mahometans.

The proposition here to be made to the Christian world, relates to the return of the Jews to their own land in Palestine. It is this. LET CHRISTIANS PURCHASE FROM THE MAHOMETANS THE SOVEREIGNTY OF PALESTINE FOR ITS FAIR VALUE, AND GIVE IT UNRESERVEDLY TO THE JEWISH NATION. Let those of that nation who desire to do so, return to it, and establish peaceably such a government as may please them. Let their nationality and sovereignty be respected and protected by all Christian nations, without at all interfering with their national polity. Then the Jews would again have a country and a name and a locality among the nations of the earth...Might we not then hope that the Lord would soon inherit Judah, his portion to the Holy Land, and "remove the iniquity of that land in one day." (Zech 2:12 and 3:9.)

To accomplish the object here suggested, it will be necessary to ascertain whether the Mahometan authorities will or will not dispose of the sovereignty of Palestine, and if they will, for what price; and then for the Christian community to raise the necessary funds. To make this purchase, not more, perhaps much less, than three millions of dollars would be necessary.

To bring this matter before the Christian world, let a convention composed of one delegate or more from each denomination of Christians, meet in the city of New-York on the 4th day of July, 1842...Christians, is it not time for us to pay over our debt of gratitude to the children of Abram? Shall we not open for them a door through which they may enter into their own paternal inheritance? May the Lord put it into the heart of every Christian to act in this manner according to his will revealed in the Scriptures of truth.

(The writer of this communication is hardly aware of many of the movements of the present eventful period, which have an important bearing on his subject. Far is it from being impossible, that the possession of Palestine by the Jews will be realized on simple political grounds. It has been for a time a "bone of contention" between great powers, mutually jealous of each other...We repeat, it may be, that, in the providence of God, these powers will install the Jews, as an independent power, in their own land again, and that soon.

Another important fact is, that it is reported the wealthy Jew Banker, Rothschild, holds a mortgage upon the land of Palestine, for money loaned the Sultan.)

Comment: I thought it was interesting that the author of this article believed that ministers should be ordained with an "ordaining prayer" and the laying on of hands. He seems to believe that there should be a set way to ordain ministers and in this article he lays out the proper protocol for this. Although he mentions other parts of the ordination service, he specifically says that all the other portions of the service are extraneous and the only indispensable part is the ordaining prayer. This idea of a laying on of hands in ordaining one to a calling is in both the Old and New Testament and is an important foundation of Mormonism, i.e. the transfer of authority and priesthood. For instance, in Numbers 27:23, it says that Moses "laid his hands upon [Joshua] and gave him a charge," in Mark 3:14 it says that Christ "ordained twelve...that he might send them forth to preach," and in Alma 13:1, it says that the "Lord God ordained priests, after his holy order."

Our first inquiry may be, What necessarily constitute such public services? - It is presumed that all will be ready to answer: The ordaining prayer, charge, and right-hand of fellowship. Without these the services are incomplete, and with them, (and laying on of hands, in case of ordination,) nothing more is indispensable...A needless multiplication of parts seems to confuse the mind, and carry it off from the one great purpose...Let the ordaining prayer, charge and right hand be ad rem, and with such scope as the solemnity of the occasion demands..."

Comment: Robinson's comments describing Israel as the "cherished scenes of his childhood" seems to have been a fairly common feeling among American Christians at this time. The strong biblical tenor of Early America as well as their own feelings that they too had traveled to and established themselves in a "Promised Land" no doubt contributed to their sentiments about Israel. It is also interesting how Robinson describes his fellow missionaries as "like the Hebrews of old" in their coming to Jerusalem to celebrate Passover. He seems to feel more kinship with the Old Testament than some other Christians at the time, who focused primarily on the New Testament. He also speaks of their missionary work as converting the people of the area to "the purity and simplicity of [the gospel's] original scriptural form," perhaps inferring in this comment that many of the churches of the day did not adhere to this form, which he seems to have believed to be the correct and true form of Christianity.

Excerpt (pages): p.37-38: "The feelings of a Christian traveller on approaching Jerusalem can be better conceived than described. Mine were strongly excited...From the earliest childhood I had read of and studied the localities of this sacred spot; now I beheld them with my own eyes; and they all seemed familiar to me, as if the realization of a former dream. I seemed to be again among cherished scenes of childhood, long unvisited indeed, but distinctly recollected...In the houses of our friends, we found collected all the members of the Syrian Mission...They had come up with their families, like the Hebrews of old, at the time of the Passover, to worship in this place, and to consult together on the best measures for promoting the great work in which they were engaged...It may not be out of place here to remark, that the object of the American Missions to Syria and other parts of the Levant, is not to draw off members of the Oriental churches to Protestantism, but to awaken them to a knowledge and belief of the Gospel-truth, in the purity and simplicity of its original scriptural form. To this end all the efforts of the Missionaries are directed; in the hope, that individuals thus enlightened, and remaining, if they choose, within the pale of their own churches, may be degrees become instrumental in infusing into the latter, life and vigour and a love of the truth, before which the various forms of error and superstition will of themselves vanish away."

Comment: This author links his defense of the trinity to the statement that the atonement could not be efficacious unless Christ was divine as well as human. The author states that his divinity made him able to atone for sin and his humanity made him able to suffer for the sins of men. Although Mormons do not believe in the Trinity, they believe that Christ inherited mortality from his mother Mary and immortality as a son of our Heavenly Father. They have a similar view to the opinion expressed in this article about why Christ was able to atone for the sins of mankind. In Mormon Doctrine, McConkie states: "Christ is the only person ever to be born in the world who had power to bring to pass the resurrection of himself or anyone else and to atone for the sins of any living being. This is because he had life in himself; he had the power of immortality by divine inheritance." (p.64)

Excerpt (pages): p.88-"We believe that the only being in the universe qualified for rescuing men from his fallen condition, and delivering him from the awful consequences of sin, is the Lord Jesus Christ. And his qualifications for this great work depend, as we conceive, entirely upon the truth of his Divinity...It is our belief, that if Christ be, in no respect, the supreme God, his blood could have no efficacy to atone for sin, nor could his righteousness be of any more avail towards the sinner's justification than the righteousness of Gabriel. It was his divinity united to his humanity, which gave to his death all its value as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men. He must be human, else he could not suffer: he must be divine, else his sufferings could not have been available for the desired end...We believe that this union of natures in Christ forms the only clue to a reconciliation of many passages of Scripture, which otherwise would be totally at variance with each other. Indeed, unless we admit Jesus Christ to be both God and man, the Bible is, in my judgement, full of the strangest inconsistencies and contradictions...In a word, the Bible ascribes to him all the names and perfections of Jehovah, and, at the same time, all the faculties and sinless infirmities of man."

Comment: The view of Robert Hall quoted in this article is that specific prophecy has ceased and the closest men can come to revelation is to feel that God is at the helm and will accomplish His will. This view, which was common at the time among many Christian religions, seems to imply that heaven was closed to further prophecy. I wonder after reading this, what such men felt about Old Testament prophets. Did they accept their prophecies? Joseph Smith often ran into views such as that expressed in this article from established Protestant churches when he claimed to have new revelation. At the same time, however, one of the main tenets of the Reformation were that men should be able to discern truth for themselves instead of being told what it was by the established church - this was often accomplished by interpreting scripture although some like Luther felt guided by God to break away from the Catholic church. Perhaps the attitude in this article was a reaction to the Millennialists, whose influence was growing in this time period, even among more established churches, and who prophesied that the world would end any day.

Excerpt (pages): p.206-"In these days, when many prophets run to and fro without knowledge being increased, we think it worth while to consider such a paragraph as the following, by Robert Hall: -- "Prophecy is not intended to give men such a knowledge of futurity as to enable even the most sagacious to predict future events. Those who have attempted, with certainty, to assign, beforehand, particular prophecies to particular events, have uniformly failed in their presumptuous endeavors. The design of prophecy is only to afford some general intimation, which may operate either as a warning or as encouragement. Its chief use is, after the event has taken place, to assure men of the universal providence of God, and convince them of that wisdom, which foresees all future events, and that power which accomplishes them when the appointed period arrives. When, therefore, the divine being has been disposed to lift, in some degree, the veil which conceals futurity, he has only done it so far as to excite a general and indefinite expectation of the event, by exhibiting its general character and features, but by no means to disclose such circumstances of time and place and instrumentality as might, in the least degree, interfere with the morality of human actions."

Comment: This article explicitly speaks of an apostasy, perhaps a reference to the time before the Protestant Reformation when the Catholic church was the only Christian church upon the earth. It is interesting that the author uses the exact word often used by Mormons in referring to this time period. This article also seems to express a progressive view of the world in relation to religion - i.e. it was in almost complete darkness during the Old Testament, was brought light during Christ's ministry, darkened again during the "apostasy" and now is being lighter and lighter in regards to truth and the number of believers. Mormons believe that the truth was largely there since the beginning of time, but like the author of this article they do believe that the world was darkened during the "apostasy." The second part of this article in which the author speaks of God "opening doors" also seems very Mormon in language and the idea that God will help us accomplish whatever is necessary for the building of His kingdom is highly reminiscent of the Book of Mormon scripture, 1 Nephi 3:7: "...I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them."

"The prophecies of the Bible have encouraged us to expect the moral condition of the world to undergo very rapid changes. The precise time of their fulfillment, we have never been able to determine. The last half century has given the most manifest proof that a brighter day is dawning upon the church than any that she has experienced since the great apostasy...Never was there such an aspect of the world before. The world used to be explored, by some to promote the interests of commerce, and by others, to spread their victorious banners over the nations of the earth. But that day has almost passed away - not that commerce is to cease - it will increase - but the day is passed when men will look at the world simply as a theatre for selfish ambition. The hand of Christian charity has been extended; and the great desire is now kindling, to fill the world quickly with the glorious gospel, which first binds the hearts of men to the eternal throne, and then the whole human family together. There is not an enterprise, taken only in its temporal aspects, that compares in magnitude and interest and glory, to the missionary enterprise...'How many facilities God gives his people in the progress of this work, which they never anticipated when they entered upon it.' This is God opening doors on our right hand and on our left, and putting into our hands the means of prosecuting this work, altogether beyond our highest expectations...Look at the Sandwich Islands - there was a nation all ripened, in the Providence of God, for the church to reap...a prophecy had been literally fulfilled. They had 'cast their idols to the moles and to the bats,' and the 'isles were waiting for his law.'...God is giving these nations into our hands."

Comment: This author of this article answers his question, "Where shall I go last all?" by stating that every person will have either eternal happiness or eternal misery in the life to come. In his defense of the doctrine of eternal life, he uses the teachings of philosophers such as Socrates and Plato to show that this idea has been taught throughout the world's history. He also teaches an idea similar to the Mormon idea that "men are that they might have joy" (2 Nephi 2:25) - i.e. that men have a desire for joy "implanted in [their] soul" and "demand a life of happiness." The article's author seems to believe that this ultimate joy will be achieved in the life to come, if one follows the precepts of the Bible and ones actions are "pleasing" to God. Finally, the article concludes by saying that men were given "unlimited faculties of mind" that they might have this unlimited joy. The Mormon idea that men may become Gods, which is the ultimate happiness and who perhaps are the only ones with "unlimited faculties of mind," has many parallels to this author's argument.

Did you consider the immortal nature of the soul, that, like its author, counts not its existence by years, but runs on parallel with eternity? And did you also consider, that for every moment of this eternity, it is capable of enjoying perfect happiness or unlimited misery? That it may continually dwell in the presence of God, or be forever debarred from the joys of Heaven? And did it also occur to you, that you really were, every day deciding this question, whether you desired it or not?...Nor can you from any reasonable analogy derive the opinion, that, if your actions are now displeasing to God, they will in any degree become less so by death. The Bible gives you rules by which to try your actions here -you may know whether your ways please God; and if they are contrary to his word now, and no change takes place, and it may reasonably be affirmed that none can take place, either in this, or in a future world, without the consent of your own will, you must admit the possibility that your actions and the temper of mind by which those actions are prompted may continue forever unlike the character of God...The doctrine of the soul's immortality was admitted by the philosophers of antiquity, on whom the light of eternal truth by the Son of God never shone. Socrates taught it...Plato also entertained and strenuously advocated the opinions of his master; and from their time this doctrine has been commonly received....But is not the thought that the soul, now capable of all the emotions of happiness, may never know after death what happiness is, repugnant to all the feelings of your nature? And do you not see that there are desires implanted in your soul, which such a theory can never satisfy? Is not such a doctrine contrary to all reasonable analogy? You believe the powers of your mind are unlimited. Why should such powers have been given for a life as short as ours?...The desires of our souls demand a life to come, and also demand a life of happiness-reason tells us that unlimited faculties of mind were given for the same purpose."

Title of Periodical: Boston Recorder and Religious Telegraph

Place of Publication: Boston, Massachusetts

Publisher: Nathaniel Willis

Date of Publication: Friday, October 30, 1840

Library Location: APS Film 051 B Reel# 544 pg.174

Nature of Source: A Congregationalist popular religious periodical published once a week, from 1815 to 1860. The paper was begun by an elder in the Congregationalist church, David I. Burr, who organized a joint stock company and commenced publication of the paper on the upper floor of the Massachusetts Sabbath School Depository. The newspaper's audience seems to have been the general Congregationalist congregation in the Boston area. The paper includes a topical index for the previous year at the beginning of each volume. Heavy emphasis on missionary work with reports from missionaries around the world as well as pleas for money and support for foreign missions. Also includes excerpts from other religious publications, reviews of new religious publications, letters to the editor, religious poetry, and notices of religious events and conferences taking places in the New England area. Ha

Comment: This article lays out in great detail the numbers of Jews who were converted to Christianity throughout the world during the previous year, as well as describing the missionary efforts in this regard. The author admonishes Americans for not being as interested in the conversion of the Jews as their Christian counterparts in England.
England would go on to play a leading role in the gathering of the Jews, but a number of Americans, as evidenced by the frequent articles in this newspaper on this subject, were also interested in the Jews. The article states that the reasons for converting the Jews is to bring in the fullness of the gospel, a millennialist sentiment (interesting in light of the established nature of Congregationalism). At this time, Millennialist ideas were beginning to pervade even established religions, and they seem to be especially evident in sentiments regarding the gathering of the Jews.

Excerpt (pages): p.174-"Mr. Editor.-It may not be known to many of your readers that there is in England a Society for the single purpose of promoting Christianity amongst the Jews. The following are the general results of its labors, as stated in the 31st report for the year 1839....As the Conversion of the Jews is to be coincident with the bringing in of the fullness of the Jews, does it constitute an object of sufficient prominence and interest to Christians in this country?...in this country is seems to be to generally imagined that their conversion to Christianity, as it is a thing impossible to man merely, is also impossible with God. But nevertheless, the Word of God standeth sure, that 'all Israel shall be saved.' (Rom. 11:26) -perhaps temporarily in being restored to the land of their fathers, and spiritually in being converted unto Christ...Doctor Tholuck, an eminent Professor in the Prussian University at Halle, has stated with reference to the Continent, that it is undoubted matter of fact that more proselytes [from Judaism to Christianity] have been made during the last twenty years, than since the first ages of the Church..."
The following views of Baptism are given in the Philadelphia Christian Observer, by Rev. Dr. R. W. Landis...There is great occasion at the present day that the Bible truth on this subject should be presented to the public mind: --

1. My first position is, that the Bible makes known ONE MODE, AND ONE ONLY, of administering the ordinance of Christian baptism.

2. All the questions that may be started in respect to the mode or form of administering this ordinance, resolve themselves merely into the following: Is the water in Christian baptism to be applied to the subject, or the subject to be applied to the water, i.e. to be dipped into it?

3. My second position is, that the Bible invariably teaches that in the administration of baptism the water is to be applied to the subject of the ordinance. A few of the arguments which sustain this position are the following:

1. Baptism is spoken of as washing. Now the primary idea of washing is the application of water to the individual or thing washed...

2. The Israelites, who were baptized in the cloud (1 Cor.) were sprinkled or baptized by an application of the water to them. The cloud passed from their front to their rear. Ex. Xiv.19. And while doing so rained upon them, as Asaph remarks in speaking of this very event. Ps. Lxxviii:16.

3. The Israelites who were baptized in the sea, were also baptized by sprinkling, for surely they were not immersed. Yet Paul says they were baptized in the sea. Yet they went through the sea on dry ground. Ex. Xiv:22. The strong east wind (see v.21) could not but produce a dashing of the spray, which sprinkled them over...

4. The Jews are yet to be converted, as all the prophets testify. And when they are engrafted into the good olive (or the church), from which they were broken off, they are of course to receive the ordinance of baptism. Ezekiel, in chapters xxxvi, xxxvii, speaks largely on the subject of their restoration and conversion to God. But in what way in the iniatory rite of baptism to be administered to them? Let the prophet speak for himself. 'For I will take you among the heathen...Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you. A new heart also will I give you." Ezek. Xxxvi:24-26."

Comment: This article argues that the survival of the members of the Jewish nation as a separate entity with their own customs, beliefs, etc... is a miracle from God. He says that while members of all other great civilizations - the Greeks, Babylonians, etc... -- have disappeared from the earth, the Jews remain. He sees this as proof that the Bible is true. This is a highly romanticized account of the survival of the Jews, but it does show the interest that people at the time had towards the Jewish race. It also illustrates the reason why many American Christians were interested in the plight of the Jews - they saw them as fellow people of the book whose very existence was proof of the verity of the Old and New Testament and who illustrated for them what the Jewish people were like that they read about in the Bible.

Excerpt (pages): p.44-"The beautiful extract which follows, is a description of that wonderful people the Jews, as true as it is striking. Infidels ask for miracles-they have one, not appearing to the eye in a flash, and then becoming a mere matter of historic record; but one standing out before all eyes and enduring for 2000 years. If they believe not upon a miracle so stupendous and indisputable, neither would they be persuaded, though one were to rise from the dead. The present physical, moral and social condition of the Jews must be a miracle. We can come to no other conclusion. Had they continued from the commencement of the Christian era down the present hour, in some such national state as that in which we find the Chinese, walled off from the rest of the human family, and by their selfishness on a national scale, and their repulsion of alien elements, resisting every assault from without, in a shape of hostile invasion, and from an overpowering national pride, forbidding the introduction of new and foreign customs, we should not see so much of miracle interwoven with their existence. But this is not their state: far from it. They are neither a united and independent nation, not a parasitic province. They are peeled, and scattered into fragments; but like broken globules of quicksilver, instinct with cohesive power, ever claiming affinity, and ever ready to amalgamate. Geography, arms, genius, polities, and foreign help do not explain their existence; time and climate, and customs equally fail to unravel it. None of these are or can be springs of their perpetuity. They have been spread over every part of the habitable globe: have lived under the reign of every dynasty; they have shared the protection of just laws, the oppression of cruel ones, and witnessed the rise and progress of both; they have used every tongue and lived in every latitude...Empires, the most illustrious, have fallen, and buried the men that constructed them, but the Jew has lived among the ruins, a living monument of indestructibility...Like their own bush on Mount Horeb, Israel has continued in the flames unconsumed. They are the aristocracy of Scripture, reft of cornets-princes of degradation...The race has inherited the heir-loom of immortality, incapable of extinction or amalgamation...The Jewish race, at this day, is perhaps the most striking seal of the truth of the sacred Oracles. There is no possibility of accounting for their perpetual isolations, their depressed but distinct being, on any grounds save those revealed in the records of truth."

Comment: The reprint in the Boston Recorder of this "firman" or order from the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire reflects the interest in the plight of the Jews among many American Christians of the time period. In the order, the Sultan says that the belief among some members of other nations that the Jews performed human sacrifice is false. He says that learned theologians had studied the matter and found that the Jews outlawed both human and animal sacrifice (the last an obvious error). The Sultan then goes on to order an end to the persecution. This decree came shortly after the Damascus Crisis of 1840, when Jews were accused of blood sacrifice and several Jews were tortured. It caused an international uproar and was the first major instance in modern times when Jews came to the aid of other Jews in other countries (ex. Montefiore, Rothschilds became involved in freeing the accused Jews). It is most significant, perhaps, that the editor of a Congregationalist newspaper judged it of interest to his readers, although it concerned a different group of people of a different religion, halfway across the world.

Excerpt (pages): p.12-"The horrid persecutions, says the N.Y. Observer, to which the Jews of Damascus have of late been subjected, had awakened for them the deepest sympathy, through the Christian world. The commission from the Jews of England, to remonstrate with the Sultan on the subject has been completely successful, and a firman issued securing these unhappy people from the evils to which they have been exposed.
The following is the firman referred to:
An ancient prejudice prevailed against the Jews. The ignorant believed that the Jews were accustomed to sacrifice a human being, to make use of his blood at their feast of the Passover. In consequence of this opinion, the Jews of Damascus and Rhodes (who are the subjects of our empire) have been persecuted by other nations. The calumnies which have been uttered against the Jews, and the vexations to which they have been subjected, have at last reached the Emperial Throne. But a short time has elapsed since some Jews, dwelling in the Isle of Rhodes, have been brought thence to Constantinople, where they have been tried and judged according to the new regulations, and their innocence of the accusations made against them fully proved. That, therefore, which justice and equity required has been done in their behalf. Besides which, the religious books of the Hebrews have been examined by learned men, well versed in their theological literature, the result of which examination is, that it is found that the Jews are strongly prohibited, not only from using human blood, but even that of animals. It therefore follows, that the charges made against them and their religion are nothing but pure calumnies. For this reason, and for the love we bear to our subjects, we cannot permit the Jewish nation (whose innocence of the crime alleged against them is evident) to be vexed and tormented upon accusations which have not the least foundation in truth, but that, in conformity to the Hatti Scherif...the Jewish nation shall possess the same advantages and enjoy the same privileges as are granted to the numerous other nations who submit to our authority...we have given the most positive orders that the Jewish nation dwelling in all parts of our empire shall be perfectly protected as well as all other subjects of the Sublime Porte, and that no person shall molest them in any manner whatever (except for a just cause), neither in the free exercise of their religion, nor in that which concerns their safety and tranquility...Given at Constantinople, the 12\textsuperscript{th} Ramazan, 1256 (6\textsuperscript{th} of November, 1840)."

Comment: This article claims that a woman's most important duty is to her family. Even a pastor's wife, with her duties in the parish, should not neglect her home while performing her other duties, according to this article. At this time in America, women were almost never ordained pastors, and therefore the issue is with the duties of a pastor's wife, rather than the duties of a woman if she were a pastor. Yet this very argument - that women might neglect their home if they were out doing other things in the public sphere - was one of the reasons used to argue that women should not serve as pastors or traveling religious exhorters.

Excerpt (pages): p.30-"We have received a communication respecting a recent article in the Recorder, with the above mentioned title. Our fair correspondent, herself a Pastor's wife, commends our humble labors in behalf of those occupying her own station in life. We rejoice with her, that the ladies of her husband's parish promptly and cheerfully sustain their full proportion of the labor and cares often elsewhere thrown without consideration upon the Pastor's wife. We are witnesses of the propriety of the following remarks. 'I have often been amused when a minister and wife have entered upon a new field of labor, to perceive the first, and almost only inquiry has been, 'is she active?' I may have been mistaken, but my interpretation has been is she prepared to assume all the labors and cares, alluded to in the recent article of the Recorder. It often happens that she is surrounded by a little family, and her husband's salary is too scanty to allow her much, if any help, and what shall she do? If she dares to step aside from the opinions so prevalent at the present day, and set upon the principle that her husband and family have the first claim upon her time, she is very sure to meet with censure and rebuke.' We are well satisfied also, with the following remarks, concurring as they do with our own views of this matter. 'It is not my wish that in any case the Pastor's Wife should be excused from her share in parish labors and duties...they should look for symmetry and beauty in all its parts, as a wife, a mother, and in the economy and arrangements of her house, as well as in the duties of the parish.'"

Comment: This is a classic example of the stereotyping of women in the mid and later 19th century as the angel of the home, more spiritual than their male counterparts and thus with a duty to maintain the moral fiber of society. Some women used such a view to gain greater access to the public sphere, arguing that their moral duty extended to such issues as slavery and prohibition. Yet on the whole, the view of women expressed in this article was very limiting to women and left them largely confined to the role of raising their children and maintaining their home.

Excerpt (pages): p.32-"What a public blessing, what an instrument of exalted good is a christian mother! It would require a pen superior to mine, to race the merits of such a character. How many, perhaps, who now hear me, feel that they owe to it all the virtue and piety that adorns them; or may recollect at this moment, some saint in heaven that brought them into light...[there is an] irresistible influence which such a mother possesses in forming the hearts of her children at a season when nature imbibes instruction at every pore. Confined by duty and inclination within the walls of her own house, every hour in her life becomes an hour of instruction, every feature of her conduct a transplanted virtue. Methinks I behold her, encircled by her beloved charge, like a being more than human, on whom every mind is bent, and every eye directed; the eager simplicity of infancy, inhaling from her lips the sacred truths of religion in adapted phrase and familiar story: the whole rule of the moral and religious duties simplified for easier infusion, the countenance of this fond and anxious parent all beaming with delight and love, and her eye raised occasionally to heaven in fervent supplication for a blessing on her work. Oh, what a glorious part does such a woman fill, and how much is the mortal to be pitied who is not struck with the image of such excellence. When I look to its consequences, and remote effects, I see the plant she has raised and cultivated, spreading through the community with richest increase of fruit. I see her diffusing happiness and virtue through a great portion of the human race. I can fancy generations yet unborn, rising to prove and hail her worth, and I adore that God who can destine a single human being to be the stem of such extended and incalculable benefits to the world."

Comment: This article states that the primitive church at first allowed any one who wished to join. As the church grew larger however, to guard against the church's "purity," early church leaders instituted classes for those who wished to join and protracted questioning to ensure that they fully understood the principles of the church. These classes and to some extent the questioning seem to bear some similarity to the discussions taught by Mormon missionaries to investigators and the bishop's interviews for both baptism and temple recommends.

Researcher: Melissa Lambert

Excerpt (pages): p.48 "The catechumens of the ancient church were candidates for baptism under instruction for admission into the Christian church. They were styled candidates, candidi, because they were wont to appear dressed in white on their admission to church...The importance of this order in the opinion of the ancient church, appears from the fact that schools were instituted especially for their instruction, and catechists appointed over them. One part of the church service was also suited to them especially, and another to the faithful. The discipline and instruction, which they received in this manner, was usually an indispensable preliminary to their admission into the church. The reasons which led to the institution of this order, are well described by Jamieson, in the following extract: 'While those who were entitled to partake of the Lord's supper were exclusively denominated the faithful, and considered as occupying the rank of perfect or approved Christians, there were several other classes of persons, who, though connected with the Church, and forming constituent parts of it, were yet separated from, and inferior to, the former, being in various stages of advancement..."
towards a qualification for the holy rites of the Gospel...In the records of apostolic times, we shall in vain look for any traces of this distinction, for then a heathen no sooner made an avowal of his faith in Christ, than he received the initiatory rite of Christianity. His conversion was immediately followed by his baptism, and whatever shades of difference there might be in the knowledge of the new converts, all were considered as equally entitled to the outward sign, as they were to the inward and spiritual benefits of the ordinance. But in the process of time, when the Church was enlarged by a daily increasing influx of members from heathenism, and when her purity was no longer guarded by the presiding care of those who possessed the miraculous gift of discerning spirits, the pious solicitude of her rulers in after-times, gave rise to the custom of deferring the admission of converts into the fellowship of the Church, till clear and satisfactory evidence was obtained of their fitness, in point of knowledge and sincerity, to be enrolled in the ranks of the disciples. The dear-bought experience of the primitive Christians had convinced them that the gross habits of idolaters were not easily and all at once, in many instances, relinquished for the pure and spiritual principles of the Gospel, and that multitudes of professed believers held their faith by so slender a tie, that the slightest temptation plunged them anew into their former sensuality, and the first alarm drove them back to the enemies' camp. To diminish, and if possible, to prevent the occurrence of such melancholy apostasies, which interrupted the peace and prosperity of the Christian society, and brought a stain on the Christian name, was a consummation devoutly wished for by the pious fathers of the primitive age; and accordingly, animated by a spirit of holy jealousy, they adopted the rule, which soon came into universal practice, of instituting a severe and protracted inquiry into the character and views of candidates for admission to the communion of the Church—of not suddenly advancing them to the honorable degree, but of continuing them for a limited period in a state of probation."

Comment: This discourse examines scriptures that infer a present immortality of the soul and discusses issues involving resurrection, damnation, and immortality. Blanchard favors the ultimate destruction of the unrepentant. This text raises (but dismisses) the possibility of a spirit "paradise" or intermediate conscious state between death and the resurrection; points out possible interpretations about where Heaven will be (i.e., in a remote spot or on this earth); summarizes contemporary views of punishment for the wicked; and speculates that the righteous will continue to "progress" in the afterlife.

Date of entry: July 10, 1999

Excerpt (pages): "The independent existence of a conscious spirit between death and resurrection may be, indeed, supposed, and the place of that existence might be called 'paradise,' in which the spirit of the thief [in Luke 23:43] might be in company with the spirit of Christ; but, as the spirit of Christ was again to enter his uncorrupted body, the case is too anomalous for an example"(10).

"...[S]ome of the declarations of Jesus [Luke 24:14, 20:35-6; John 5:28-9] announce the resurrection of believers at a future day, without any intimation of an intermediate conscious state of being. This mere omission certainly does not deny such a state, and has but little force in disallowing it, in face of the passages for it above cited; but it is remarkable that, as the eternal life promised is here always connected with resurrection, the language seems to imply that such immortality is not to be assigned to any spirits in whom the resurrection of a body is not to be produced; and this, of course, refutes the doctrine of inherent, irrefragable immortality in every human soul. It is worthy of remark here, that, both by Christ and his apostles, death is spoken of under the figure of 'sleep;' an expression which could scarcely be used to denote an active or conscious state, and, if it implies continued existence, conveys only the idea of that existence is a torpid condition"(12).

"The most common opinion among Christians seems to be, that, at or after the resurrection, they are to be transferred to a remote heaven; and that such as removal is to some place designated by that term, and distinguished from the earth, is clearly indicated by several passages of Scripture [Matthew 26:19, 28:10, 22:30; Mark 12:25; Luke 26:22-26, 24:51; John 14:2; Acts 1:9; 2 Cor 5:1; Col. 3:2; 1 Thes. 4:17; 1 Pet. 1:4]. On the other hand, there is one passage [2 Pet. 3:13] which speaks of a renewed earth as the abode of righteousness, and several [Matt 19:28, 24:30, 26:64; Mark 8:38, 14:62; Luke 1:32-33, 21:27; John 1:51; Acts 2:30, 27:31; Rom. 2:16; 2 Tim. 4:1] which represent Christ as judging the world on a throne of glory, which is spoken of as if to be held on earth...and being seen by earthly nations and men in that glory, the renewed saints, of course, included; and there are many passages in which the phrase 'kingdom of heaven,' or 'kingdom of God,' appears to be applied to the condition or government of this world, and are not generally considered as signifying those of a future life, but merely the prevalence of Christianity on earth" (14-15).

"It is the ultimate fate of the unjust, or wicked, for which we now search the Scriptures. It is well know that there are three doctrines on this question among Christians. First, that eternal life is to be the inheritance of all men, but that the good only are to experience this in happiness; the wicked unbelievers, or disobedient, are to exist forever in interminable misery: second, that though the wicked may hereafter suffer painful punishment for a time, all are ultimately to be restored to an everlasting happy life: and, third, that, after the resurrection and judgment, the wicked, or unbelievers, are to be destroyed and cease to exist as sentient organized beings, for ever"(17).
"The only remaining question within the reach of human research is, whether those on whom immortal life is conferred are to be susceptible of progress or future improvement after they attain the post-resurrection state. On this question the Scriptures give us no light. ... but a very simple process of reasoning, if attended to, would probably leave no doubt in any intelligent mind. A capacity of mental improvement, of perpetual acquisition of knowledge, is so essential an element of excellence in an intelligent being, forming such a crowning eminence of character in the present world, that it seems preposterous to suppose its absence in a state ever represented more exalted. Divine Providence has deeply implanted curiosity in every human mind, and has inseparably attached animated pleasure to investigation, to pursuit, to exertion; and they are called forth chiefly by the prospect of new attainments, and, of course, imply a capacity for them. Knowledge and ability are here gained step by step; and analogy leads us to presume that they will ever be so. Improbable is the supposition, than an inconceivable completion of intellectual and moral capacities would be bestowed on any being by instantaneous imposition; and dreary indeed would be the experience of a state, however exalted, which must be endured in the apathy of despair of all further advancement. The divinely implanted aspirations of the heart urgently point out an ever-ascending progress."(31). ... "The anticipation of an ever-accelerated progress calls up the most eager emotions of encouraged hope: it promises a never-ceasing range through the ever-varied aspects of a boundless universe. New and still newer discoveries of the countless forms of organized beings will open more and more on the amazement at the wisdom of a creating Deity"(32).

Excerpt (pages): "You admit, therefore, that all the actual consequences of free will, the unhappiness and ruin of a great proportion of mankind, entered into the general plan of providence, which is as much as saying that the plan required them, and could not proceed so well without them. And, if so, what objection can you have to the Divine Being having absolutely decreed them? If his plan absolutely required these evils, it is plain, that, at any rate, he must introduce them... According to us both, the evils were necessarily, either to free will, or to general happiness"(209-210).

Author: Andrew Michael Ramsay (Chevalier Ramsay)

Title of Book: The Travels of Cyrus: to Which Is Annexed, a Discourse upon the Theology and Mythology of the Pagans.

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Manning and Loring, for S. Hall, etc.

Date of Publication: 1795

Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phoenicia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Dirodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Comment: The excerpts below make free agency (and the possibility of evil) a consequence of reason and a part of God's plan for human happiness. Since intelligences are reasonable and free, however, the following arguments also render the idea of a premortal rebellion feasible.

Excerpt (pages): Cyrus: "Shew me which way to justify the eternal wisdom; why had God created free beings, intelligences capable of evil? Why has he bestowed on them so fatal a gift?" (222).

"Liberty, answered Eleazar, is a necessary consequence of our reasonable nature. To be free, is to be able to choose; to choose, is to prefer. Every being, capable of reasoning and comparing, can prefer, and consequently choose. It is true, in every choice we necessarily choose what appears to us the best, but we can suspend our choice till we have examined whether the good that presents itself be a real good, or only an apparent one. . . Spirits only are active, and capable of self-motion. God gives them activity as well as being; an activity different from his, as well as substance distinct from his. One of the essential differences between bodies and souls is this; the one are necessarily transported wherever the moving power carries them, the other suffer themselves to be moved only by the reason that enlightens them. God could not give us intelligence, without giving us liberty" (223).

"To ask why God has made fallible intelligences, is to ask why he has made them finite, or why he has not created gods as perfect as himself. A thing impossible" (224).

"Under the empire of God himself, answered Eleazar, despotick rule and liberty are incompatible. . . . [H]e will not employ his absolute power to destroy the free nature of intelligent beings; if he did, they would act no longer from choice, but necessity; they would obey, but they would not love" (224).

"The infinitely perfect Being. . . . wills the happiness of all intelligences, knows all the means requisite to accomplish his will, and sooner or later will render those means absolutely and infallibly efficacious, without violating the liberty of spirits. The permission of sin, expiatory pains, and all the fatal consequences of our [premortal] rebellion, are a part of those means and of the plan of his adorable providence" (Ramsay 224).

Title of Book: An Account of the Nature and Extent of the Divine Dominion and Goodnesse especially as they refer to the Origenian Hypothesis concerning the Preexistance of Souls together with a special Account of the vanity and groundlesnes of the Hypothesis it self. Being a second Letter Written to his Honoured Friend and Kinsman Mr. Nath. Bisbie.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Oxford
Publisher: W. Hall for R. Davis
Date of Publication: 1666.
Nature of Source: Parker (1640-1688) is an Anglican, an M.C.T and a Fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote from both Trinity College and Cambridge. In 1686 he was made bishop of Oxford. "He criticised Plato, Aristotle, Descartes, and Hobbes; attacked the puritans, and wrote on ecclesiastical history and political science"(Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee, eds., The Dictionary of National Biography, Volume XV. London: Oxford University Press, 1959-60: 272-275, at 272). This letter was included in a collection of five essays, including a 1662 letter about "the new Sect of Lattitude Men" and a 1666 treatise called A free and Impartial Censure of the Platonick Philosophie, both by Parker. The volume also includes work by other authors, including a 1723 dissertation about the "fall of man and the Coming of Christ," a 1608 discussion of predestination, and a 1726 rebuttal of "unconditional election and reprobation," by Edward Bird.
Comment: Parker here sets out his conception of free agency and necessary temptation in order to refute Origenian claims that God would be unfair to send souls into evil bodies in an evil world, where they would be sure to fail. He writes, "Tis an objection sets too mean a value upon humane Nature, and supposes mankind no better then Mushrooms, as if all men were but so many Engines moved by the wheels of Custome, and had not faculties within them able to discern of the good and evil of Customes, as well as of other things"(75).

Excerpt (pages): "My Hypothesis is this, That is has pleased Providence to place mankind here in an immature and more imperfect state, that so we might in a way congruous to free and rational Agents by degrees be fitted for, and at length arrive at a better and more raised condition of life. . . . [S]o is mankind Created and born into the World as it were in the Spring, in a Budding and Blossoming season, that so we may by proceeding forward in the differing Periods of our lives, grow up to higher and more excellent Capacities, till at length we ripen into a state of maturity and perfection."(62).
"Mankind then is an order of Beings placed in a middle state between Angels and Brutes, made up of contrary principles, viz. Matter and Spirit, endued with contrary Faculties, viz., Animal and Rational, and encompass'd with contrary Objects proportion'd to their respective faculties, that so they may be a capacity to exercise the Vertues proper and peculiar to their compounded and heterogenial Natures. For the perfection of humane Souls does not consist in an effeminate Beauty, and Physical proportions, but in a manly courage and moral accomplishments, as at the Olympick Games there was no regard had to Beauty and Neatness, they only were capable of honour and reputation, who had courage and patience enough to combate. And the life of man in this world is nothing else but an Olympick exercise. God having placed us here not to admire the native Beauty and Perfection of our Beings, but to exercise our selves in the conflicts and difficulties of Vertue; therefore the worth and praise of the Soul, consists in a Braveness and Gallantry of the Spirit, when it scorns to be usurp'd upon by those faculties that ought to obey her, and checks and controules all their unruly and tumultuous exorbitances by her own sovereign and imperial Laws, and resolutely defends its own Authority and Prerogative against all the furious and rebellious attempts of Passion and Concupiscence. And therefore though human Souls be capable of subsisting by themselves, yet God has placed them in Bodies, full of brutish and unreasonable Propensions, that they might be capable of exercising many choice and excellent Vertues. . . . Religion is common to Men and Angels, appertaining to them purely as Spirits, but Vertue is proper to man alone, and belongs to him as a Being made up of contrary principles. . . "(63-64).

"And therefore the Platonists, though they place all Intellectual Vertues. . . [Greek word] in the abstracted Soul, yet they will have all moral ones reside. . . [Greek word] in the Composition, denying the naked Soul to be capable of moral Good or Evil, these belonging only to the whole which results from Soul and Body; . . [Greek word] saies Plotinus"(64). The sluggish nature of matter "naturally hinders and obstructs the intellectual efforts of the mind, and inclines it to the love of material and sensual objects" and hence results in vice.(65). "So that man seems to differ from the Angels only in this, that he must by conquest and industry win the happiness, which is entail'd on their Natures"(68). . . "So that the whole design of Providence, in sending us to this world, is only that we may in a way congruous to rational Agents, prepare ourselves for another; and therefore the Souls of men shall at their departure hence, be stated in a condition proportion'd to their good or bad Qualifications" (69).

"Mankind is furnished with such faculties, by the use whereof he may arrive at Vertue and Happiness. . . . And now, if the mind of man be a deliberative and elective Principle, able to discern between Good and Evil, Happiness and Misery, and to choose the one and refuse the other, then 'tis at its own choice, and in its own power to be Vertuous and Happy. . . . Mankind, notwithstanding the force of their brutish Inclinations, is placed in a fair capacity of living well & happily, which utterly destroys all the forementioned Arguments alledged from the Phaenomenon of Providence, on the behalf of Pre-existence"(74).

Author: Edward Beecher, D.D.
Title of Book: The Conflict of Ages; or, the Great Debate on the Moral Relations of God and Man. Fifth Edition.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston and London
Publisher: Phillips, Sampson & Co.; Sampson Low, Son & Co.
Date of Publication: 1854
Nature of Source: This 552 page book was first published in1853 and, according to Jacob Blain's review (A Review, Giving the Main Ideas in Dr. Edward Beecher's Conflict of Ages: And a Reply to Them, and Also to the Views of His Reviewers. n.p: n.p, 1853?), was in its fifth edition only three months after it was published (Blain 2). The book's purpose is to show how the doctrine of the "native and original depravity of man" can be understood "as not to be inconsistent with the highest principles of honor and right" (Beecher 2.4). Beecher reviews theories about the Divine nature, human nature, and the fall and suggests that a conscious fall in a pre-existent state would make humans-not God-culpable for their inherent depravity. Beecher is the son of Dr. Lyman Beecher and brother of Henry Ward Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Comment: These excerpts present several different nineteenth-century views of free agency, including the view that temptation is necessary to the exercise of free agency and is ultimately beneficial to life's purpose: improving one's character. (Beecher believes that since humans are generally in a sinful state, this view degrades the concept of free agency by implying that degraded humanity is the best that free agency can produce.)

Date of entry: July 21, 1999

Excerpt (pages): "One result of the Unitarian views is altogether undesigned, and was little foreseen by the leaders of the system. . . . It is the virtual degradation of free agency itself, in their efforts to elevate the existing nature of man. They assert that God created men from age to age with such moral constitutions as the claims of equity and honor demand. But the history of the world, as they state it, contradicts the idea that men are born holy, or with powerful and predominating tendencies to good. Therefore they take the ground of Dr. Ware: 'Man is by nature-by which is to be understood as he is born into the world, as he comes form the hands of the Creator-innocent and pure; he is by nature no more inclined or disposed to vice than to virtue, and is equally capable, in the ordinary use of his faculties, and with the common assistance afforded him, of either.' Thus, in order to account for the actual sinfulness of man in this world, . . . [t]hey abandon the idea of minds created with original righteousness, and, therefore, with strong predominant and effective tendencies to good, as unphilosophical, or even impossible. They take the ground that God has given to men, as necessarily limited, ignorant, imperfect, new-created beings, all that the nature of free agency will allow. . . . Indeed, it would seem logically to result in the principle that sinning is a general necessity of all finite moral beings, as such, and is an essential part of a moral education, designed to result in stable virtue" (141-142).

Dr. Burnap: "'Man being free, the only way in which his character can be established is by fixing his deliberate and habitual choice on good. Accordingly, this seems to be the whole purpose of the present life. This world is a state of discipline, having in view this very end,--the production in man of a holy character.'

"This view accounts for the universal sin of this world by the necessary nature of free agency and of a state of probation, as designed to form a holy character. Of course, as in a great majority of cases these is an entire failure to secure this result, we are compelled to entertain very low ideas of the possibilities of free agency" (143) and to feel less anxious about the possibility of sin.

One view: depravity is explained by "a stated exercise of divine efficiency to produce sinful volitions in every human being, from the beginning of his existence. . . . If Adam had obeyed, then God, by direct efficiency, would have statedly caused obedience in all his posterity; but, as he sinned, God statedly causes sin. This view is adopted and defended as necessary, on account of a theory of free agency, which denies to any moral agent the power of choice, except through the agency of God to cause him to choose, and which asserts the exercise of the same divine agency in sinful as in holy choice" (168-169).

"There is a theory which makes the essential nature of free agency such that the limitation of divine power is not temporary, and confined to the earlier generations of creatures, but is eternal. Such was the theory of Origen. Accordingly, he held that, after fallen spirits had been restored by a material system, and it had been destroyed, they and others would again fall, and another similar system be needed; and thus that there would be an eternal succession of such systems, and of redemption through them. From this view Augustine very properly revolted. . . . He [Origen] based his theory, as Mosheim has clearly shown, on the false philosophy of Ammonius Saccas, and not upon the great and leading facts of the word of God" (514-15).

Date of Publication: 1853? This review was also appended to the 1859 Boston edition of Blain's Death not Life
Nature of Source: Blain is a destructionist: opposed to Universalism because he believes that not everyone will be saved, but also opposed to doctrines of endless misery, since he believes in the final annihilation of the unrepentant. This 36-page review was included in a microfilm collection of the works of Early Adventist, or Post-Millerite, groups from 1844-1870. See Ronald L. Numbers and Jonathan M. Butler, eds, The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987).

Blain reviews Conflict of Ages, a book by Edward Beecher (son of Dr. Lyman Beecher) that was in its fifth edition only three months after it was published (2). Comment: Blain addresses Beecher's thesis that seeming injustices of this life can be explained by positing a Fall in a pre-existent state. Blain disagrees with this final hypothesis, stating that evil does not compromise God's justice as long as evil itself is finite. The following excerpts represent temptation as necessary to the exercise of free agency and propose a " fortunate fall."

Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist
Date of entry: July 2, 1999
Excerpt (pages): "I own I can see no great mystery is the existence of evil, since I saw it was to come to an eternal end. A thinking man can see that much good can result from it, if it is only temporary. . . . To constitute free agency (a great object,) there must be temptation. God could, on 'principles of honor and right,' place temptations before new created beings, as before Adam and Eve, if he foresaw or purposed the final ending of the sin and misery of a fall; also saw that eternal good to his universe would be the effects of such a trial and fall" (17).

"Wherever sin originated, God in wisdom and justice, ordered temptation to exist.
A holy being, and we must believe all were created such, could not sin, unless a temptation existed. This is a self-evident truth. But notice: this does not exclude the idea that there was no guilt in yielding to the temptation. The promise is, and ever was, 'to him that overcometh,' and the woe to him that does not. Yet from this view, who, on due reflection, considering well the weakness of the new created being, and the power of the temptation, can believe that a God of pity, as well as of justice, threatened eternal torture, for a failure to overcome? Reason can see that a less penalty would be just, benevolent, and wise.

"God's works are great. He is doing on a grand scale in our earth, what we see simply in miniature in such historic facts as I have noticed. We know the earth is but a speck in the vast universe, yet he is making an exhibition here, which will affect all worlds and the eternal future. . . . So we see that among his unnumbered mighty works in the universe, the most sublime one seems to be doing on our little planet; and being done by or through the introduction of evil."(18-19).

Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist
Date of entry: June 29, 1999
Excerpt (pages): "PRE-EXISTENCE OF JESUS CHRIST, is his existence before he was born of the Virgin Mary. That he really did exist before is plain from John iii. 13. John vii.50, John xvii. John viii.58. 1 John i.4; but there are various opinions respecting this existence. Some acknowledge, that in Jesus Christ there is a divine nature, a rational soul, and a human body. His body, they think, was formed in the Virgin's womb; his human soul, they suppose, was the first and most excellent of all the works of God: was brought into existence before the creation of the world, and subsisted in happy union in heaven with the second person in the Godhead, till his incarnation. These divines differ from those called Arians, for the latter ascribe to Christ only a created deity, whereas the former hold his true and proper divinity: they differ from the Socinians, who believe no existence of Christ before his incarnation: they differ from the Sabellians, who only own a trinity of names: they differ, also, from the generally received opinion, which is, that the human soul began to exist in his mother's womb, in exact conformity to that likeness unto his brethren, of which St. Paul Speaks, Heb ii. 17. The writers in favour of the pre-existence of Jesus Christ's human soul recommend their thesis by these arguments.

"1. Christ is represented as his Father's messenger, or angel, being distinct from this Father, sent by his Father long before his incarnation, to perform actions which seem to be too low for the dignity of pure Godhead. The appearances of Christ to the patriarchs are described like the appearances of an angel, or man really distinct from God; yet such a one, in whom God, or Jehovah, had a peculiar indwelling, or with whom the Divine nature had a personal union.

"2. Christ, when he came into the world, is said, in several passages of scripture, to have divested himself of some glory which he had before his incarnation. Now if there had existed before this time nothing but his divine nature, this divine nature could not properly divest itself of any glory... [John xvii.4,5. 2 Cor. viii.9.] It cannot be said of God that he became poor: he is infinitely self-sufficient; he is necessarily and eternally rich in perfections and glories. Nor can it be said of Christ as man, that he was rich, if he were never in a richer state before, than while he was on earth.

"It seems needful that the soul of Christ should pre-exist, that it might have an opportunity to give its previous actual consent to the great and painful undertaking of atonement for our sins. It was the human soul of Christ that endured the weakness and pain of his infant state, all the labours and fatigues of life, the reproaches of men, and the sufferings of death. The divine nature is incapable of suffering. The covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son is therefore represented as being made before the foundation of the world. To suppose that simple Deity or the divine essence, which is the same in all the three personalities, would make a covenant with itself, is inconsistent.

"Christ is the angel in whom God was in a peculiar manner united, and who in this union made all the divine appearances related in the old Testament."
"God is often represented in scripture as appearing in a visible manner, and assuming a human form. See Gen. iii.8. xvii.1.xxviii.12. xxxii.24. Exod. ii.2 and a variety of other passages.

"The Lord Jehovah, when he came down to visit men, carried some ensign of divine majesty: he was surrounded with some splendid appearance. Such a light often appeared at the door of the tabernacle, and fixed its abode on the ark, between the cherubims [sic]. It was by the Jews called the Skekinah, i.e. the habitation of God. Hence, he is described as dwelling in light, and clothed with light as with a garment. In the midst of this brightness there seems to have been sometimes a human shape and figure. It was probably this heavenly light that Christ divested himself when he was made flesh. With this he was covered at his transfiguration in the mount, when his garments were white as the light; and at his ascension into heaven, when a bright cloud received, or invested him: and when he appeared to John, Rev. i.13. and it was with this he prayed his Father would glorify him.

"Sometimes the great and blessed God appeared in the form of a man or angel. It is evident that the true God resided in this man or angel; because on account of this union to proper Deity, the angel calls himself God, the Lord God. He assumes the most exalted names and characters of God head. And the spectators, and sacred historians, it is evident, considered him as true and proper God: they paid him the highest worship and obedience. He is properly styled the angel of God's presence.-The (messenger or ) angel of the covenant, Isa. lxii. Mal. iii. 1.

"The same angel of the Lord was the particular God and King of the Israelites. It was he who made a covenant with the patriarchs, who appeared to Moses in the burning bush, who redeemed the Israelites from Egypt, who conducted them through the wilderness, who gave the law at Sinai, and transacted the affairs of the ancient church.

"The angels who have appeared since our blessed Saviour became incarnate, have never assumed the names, titles, characters, or worship, belonging to God. Hence we may infer that the angel who, under the Old Testament, assumed divine titles, and accepted religious worship, was that peculiar angel of God's presence, in who God resided, or who was united to the Godhead in a peculiar manner; even the pre-existent soul of Christ, who afterwards took flesh and blood upon him, and was called Jesus Christ on earth.

"Christ represents himself as one with the Father: I and the Father are one, John x.30. xiv 10,11. There is, we may hence infer, such a peculiar union between God and the man Christ Jesus, both in his pre-existent and incarnate state, that he may be properly called God man in one complex person.

"Among those expressions of scripture which discover the pre-existence of Christ there are several from which we may derive a certain proof of his divinity. Such are those places in the Old Testament, where the angel who appeared to the ancients is called God the Almighty God, Jehovah, the Lord of Hosts, I am that I am &c. . . . [from here see Fessenden & Co.'s Encyclopedia of Religion passage, which repeats information about Dr. Watts's opinions regarding pre-existence and discusses opposition to the pre-existence idea] (413-415).

These excerpts discuss historical conceptions of angels: their origins, their substance, their nature, and their roles. They are explicitly related to the term "Intelligences" (see also pages 29, 34-43). The excerpts below also compare angels with human souls; the 6th paragraph alludes to Adam's state before the fall.

In the thirteenth century:] "To start with the least controversial tenet of Christian angelology: all angels are creatures, the direct creation of God alone."(56) "Dante never asserts anything more than a hierarchical operational interdependence between the angels" i.e. they are not successive emanations of each other.

"In Patristic times, the tendency was to regard God alone as pure spirit. Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian, and Ambrose all ascribe some sort of corporeality to angels. Tertullian is strongly convinced of this, and speaks of a: "[corpus] sui generis; nihil est incorporale nisi quod non est." Origen and Hilary think that angels are spiritual by nature but are nevertheless endowed with corporeality as a principle of localisation. Augustine, despite the cautious note prevalent in certain of his passages on this subject, supports the concept of angelic corporeality"(58). [Some Medieval thinkers disagreed with a thesis of incorporeality that emerged after the fourth century:] "In the Twelfth century, Rupert of Deutz and Bernard of Clairvaux both supported the idea of an angelic airy body. In the following century, such an opinion would have been viewed with suspicion after the 1215 Lateran Council, which incidentally affirmed the incorporeality of angels, in the course of attacking Albigsian doctrines on the creation"(59). [Still,] "representatives of the Franciscan school, whilst denying the angels any aetheral body, still ascribed to them a form-matter composition"(59).

"Dante believes that angels possess in common with men not only intellect, but also will, and that this will is essentially free"(73).

"Augustine [unlike Aquinas] does not seem to have been concerned with a rational-intellectual distinction [between humans and angels], and, to take a thirteenth-century example, Bonaventure refuses to accept any intrinsic epistemological difference between angels and human souls. For him, our earthly ratiocination is a purely contingent consequence of man's Fall; the pre-lapsarian Adam knew intuitively"(73).

"Most fathers, including Basil, Gregory Nazianzenus, Chrysostom and, in the West, Ambrose, Hilary, and Jerome, opted for the view that [creation of] the angels preceded the visible universe. Others supported a creation simultaneous with that of the visible world, among them Epiphanius, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Basil of Seleucia, Theodoret of Cyrus and Gregory the Great. Gennadius even thought the angels were created after the heaven, the earth and the water. Augustine is more cautious, but two passages in the De civitate Dei suggest he favoured a simultaneous creation, interpreting the lux of Genesis I, 3 as including the angels"(77). [By the 13th century, simultaneous creation was the general view (78).]

"Certain Dantean positions concerning the nature of the angels (that their being is identical with their operation; that they are actus purus) seem to betray the influence of Averroes—though this cannot be established with certainty. More generally, the whole balance in Dante between First Cause and Secondary Causes gives a marked prominence to the latter: God himself is seen as creating nothing apart from the angels, the heavens, Prime Matter and the rational souls of men. Dante's conception of the Intelligences as imprinters of sublunar form, whose role included even the formation of the first earthly bodies—immediately after God's creation of angels, heavens, and Prime Matter—is incompatible with Thomism. This is also true of his typically neo-Platonic belief that incorruptibility is exclusively the feature of those things directly created by God, and corruptibility of those things formed by Intelligences. Dante's view of secondary causality is redolent of Islamic neo-Platonism, although . . . it is fair to suppose that the influence of Avicenna . . . was indirect. Though in some respects Dante's cosmos is reminiscent of Avicenna's there are evident differences, . . . not least between his angeli and Avicenna's dator formarum (the source from which flow all earthly forms, our human souls included)"(181).

Nature of Source: A popular theological resource of 521 pages used extensively by theological dictionaries and encyclopedias which came after it (see Brown's Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1836), for example). The dictionary was first published in London in 1802; it went through 42 printings, the last one in Philadelphia in 1873. Reverend Buck lived from 1771 to 1815 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 82. 1970: 136-138).

Comment: This extensive entry raises the idea of "eternal matter"-but primarily in defense of creation ex nihilo. It echoes the themes of Natural Theology when it declares that the variety of forms on this earth, and the possibility of other worlds inhabited by rational beings, are evidence of god's glory and power. These rational beings, called "intelligences," are linked to the traditional Christian view of "angels." This entry also reinforces a spirit/matter dichotomy in which matter is inferior to spirit. The majority of the original entry is included below.

Excerpt (pages): "CREATION, in its primary import, signifies the bringing into being something which did not before exist. The term is therefore most generally applied to the original production of the materials whereof the visible world is composed. It is also used in a secondary or subordinate sense to denote those subsequent operations of the Deity upon the matter so produced, by which the whole system of Nature, and all the primitive genera of things, receive their form, qualities, and laws.

"There is no subject concerning which learned men have differed in their conjectures more than in this of creation. 'It is certain,' as a good writer observes, 'that none of the ancient philosophers had the smallest idea of its being possible to produce a substance out of nothing, or that even the power of the Deity himself could work without any materials to work upon. Hence some of them, among whom was Aristotle, asserted that the world was eternal, both as to its matter and form. Others, though they believed that the gods had given the world its form, yet imagined the materials whereof it is composed to have been eternal. Indeed, the opinions of the ancients, who had not the benefit of revelation, were on this head so confused and contradictory, that nothing of any consequence can be deduced from them. The free-thinkers of our own and of former ages have denied the possibility of creation, as being a contradiction to reason; and of the consequence have taken the opportunity from thence to discredit revelation. On the other hand, many defenders of the sacred writing have asserted that creation out of nothing, so far from being a contradiction to reason, is not only probably but demonstrably certain. Nay, some have gone so far as to say that from the very inspection of the visible system of Nature, we are able to infer that it was once in a state of non-existence.' We cannot, however, here enter into the multiplicity of arguments on both sides; it is enough for us to know what God has been pleased to reveal, both concerning himself and the works of his hands. 'Men, and other animals that inhabit the earth and the seas; all the immense varieties of herbs and plants of which the vegetable kingdom consists; the globe of the earth, and the expanse of the ocean; these we know to have been produced by his power.
Besides the terrestrial world, which we inhabit, we see many other material bodies disposed around it in the wide extent of space. The moon, which is in a particular manner connected with our earth, and even dependent upon it, the sun, and the other planets, with their satellites, which like the earth circulate around the sun, and appear to derive from him light and heat; those bodies which we call fixed stars, and consider as illuminating and cherishing with heat each its peculiar system of planets; and the comets which at certain periods surprise us with their appearance, and the nature of whose connection with the general system of Nature, or with any particular system of planets, we cannot pretend to have fully discovered; these are so many more of the Deity's works, from the contemplation of which we cannot but conceive the most awful ideas of his creative power.

"Matter, however, whatever the varieties of form, under which it is made to appear, the relative disposition of its parts, or the motions communicating to it, is but an inferior part of the words of creation. We believe ourselves to be animated with a much higher principle than brute matter: in viewing the manners and oeconomy of the lower animals we can scarce avoid acknowledging even them to consist of something more than various modifications of matter and motion. The other planetary bodies, which seem to be circumstances nearly analogous to those of our earth, are surely, as well as it, destined for the habitations of rational intelligent beings. The existence of intelligences of an higher order than man, though infinitely below the Deity, appears extremely probable. Of these spiritual beings, called angels, we have express intimation in scripture, (see the article ANGEL.) But the limits of the creation we must not pretend to define. How far the regions of space extend, or how far they are filled, we know not. How the planetary worlds, the sun, and the fixed stars are occupied, we do not pretend to have ascertained.
We are even ignorant how wide a diversity of forms, what an infinity of living animated beings may inhabit our own globe. So confined is our knowledge of creation, yet so grand, so awful, that part which our narrow understandings can comprehend! . . .'

"[Discussion of age of the earth]. Uncertain, however, as we may be as to the exact time of the creation, we may profitably apply ourselves to the contemplation of this immense fabric. . . Here the Christian is led into the most delightful field of contemplation. To him every pebble becomes a preacher, and every atom a step by which he ascends to his Creator" (104-105). [See Ray and Blackmore on the Creation; Art

This entry concerns a group of Egyptian Gnostics in the 2nd Century A.D., and specifically explains the group's belief in aions, or pre-existent spirits (Adams refers to aions as "intelligences" in her entry on "Gnostics") that acted as "Second Causes" or creators and that were capable of sinning. The explanation also suggests the idea of foreordination, since aions had a particular dispensation and sphere of action for which they were responsible. Cf. Jacob Blain's 1863 discourse on Bible Meaning of Forever and Everlasting, which discusses aion as a Greek word meaning "eternal and everlasting."

Excerpt (pages): "They acknowledged the existence of one supreme God, perfect in goodness and wisdom, who produced from his own substance seven beings, or aions, of a most excellent nature. Two of these aions, called Dunamis and Sophia, (i.e. power and wisdom,) engendered the angels of the highest order. These angels formed a heaven for their habitation, and bought forth others of a nature somewhat inferiour to their own, to the amount of three hundred and sixty five, under their mighty chief Abraxas. . . . It may be worthy of remark, that by this sect the word aion, from expressing only the duration of beings, was by metonymy employed to signify the beings themselves. Thus the Supreme Being was called aion; and the angels were distinguished by the title of aions. . . . They [the Basilidians] had formed to themselves the notion of an invisible world, composed of entities, or virtues, proceeding from the Supreme Being, and succeeding each other at certain intervals of time, so as to form an eternal chain, of which our world was the terminating link"(42).

[Beings in the chain had a certain temporal term and a certain sphere of action. The term of duration was first called an aion, and later the beings themselves became known as aions.] "These beings, advanced to the government of the world which they had created, fell by degrees from their original purity, and soon manifested the fatal marks of depravity and corruption"(42).

Angel: a spiritual intelligent substance, the first in rank and dignity among created beings. The word angel . . . [Greek characters] is Greek and signifies a messenger. The Hebrew word . . . [Hebrew characters] signifies the same. Angels, therefore, in the proper signification of the word, do not import the nature of any being, but only the office to which they are appointed, especially by way of message or intercourse between God and his creatures. Hence the word is used differently in various parts of the scripture, and signifies. 1 Human messengers, or agents for others, 2 Psalms ii.5. 'David sent messengers (Heb. Angels) to Jabesh Gilead, Prov xiii.17. Mark 1.2. James ii.25.-2. Officers of the churches, whether prophets or ordinary ministers, Hag. i.13. Rev. i. 20.-3. Jesus Christ, Mal. iii.1. Is. lxiii.9.-4. Some add the dispensations of God's providence, either beneficial or calamitous, Gen. xxxiv.7. Psalms xxxiv.7. Acts xii.23 1 Sam xiv.14; but I must confess, that, though I do not at all see the impropriety of considering the providences of God as his angels or messengers for good or for evil, yet the passages generally educed under this head do not prove to me that the providences of God are meant in distinction from created angels.-5. Created intelligences, both good and bad, Heb. I.14. Jude 6. The subject of the present article.-As to the time when angels were created, much has been said by the learned. Some wonder that Moses, in his account of the creation, should pass over this in silence. Others suppose that he did this because of the proneness of the Gentile world, and even the Jews, to idolatry: but a better reason has been assigned by others, viz. that this first history was purposely and principally written for information concerning the visible world; the invisible, of which we know but in part, being reserved for a better life. Some think that the idea of God's not creating them before this world was made is very contracted. To suppose, say they, that no creatures whatever, neither angels nor other worlds, had been created previous to the creation of our world, is to suppose that a Being of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, had remained totally inactive from all eternity, and had permitted the infinity of space to continue a perfect vacuum till within these 6000 years; that such an idea only tends to discredit revelation, instead of serving it. On the other hand it is alleged, that they must have been created within the six days; because it is said, that within this space God made heaven and earth, and all things that are therein. It is, however, a needless speculation, and we dare not indulge a spirit of conjecture. It is our happiness to know that they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation.

"As to the nature of these beings, we are told that they are spirits; but whether pure spirits divested of all matter, or united to some thin bodies, or corporeal vehicles, has been a controversy of long standing: the more general opinion is, that they are substances entirely spiritual, though they can at any time assume bodies, and appear in human shape, Ge. xviii. And xix. Gen. xxxii. Matt. xxvii. Luke i. &c. The scriptures represent them as endowed with extraordinary wisdom and power, 2 Sam. xiv.20 Ps. cii.20; holy, and regular in their inclinations, zealous in their employ, and completely happy in their minds, Job xxxviii.7. Heb.i.7 Matt, xviii.10. Their number seems to be great, Ps. lxviii.17. Heb. xii.22; and perhaps have distinct orders, Col.i.16,17. 1 Pet. iii.22 1 Thes iv.16. Dan x.13. They are delighted with the grand scheme of redemption, and the conversion of sinners to God. Luke ii.12 1 Pet. i.12. Luke xv.10. They not only worship God, and execute this commands at large, but are attendant on the saints of God while here below, Ps. xci. 11, 12. Heb. i.13 Luke xvi.22 Some conjecture that every good man has his particular guardian angel, Matt. xviii.10 Acts xii.15; but this is easier to be supposed than to be proved; nor is it a matter of consequence to know. 'What need we dispute,' says Henry, 'Whether every particular saint has a guardian angel, when we are sure he has a guard of angels about him?' They will gather the elect in the last day, attend the final judgment, Matt. xxv.31 Rev. xiv. 18. Matt. xiii 39 And live for ever in the world of glory, Luke xx.36.

"Although the angels were originally created perfect, yet they were mutable: some of them sinned and kept not their first estate; and so, of the most blessed and glorious, became the most vile and miserable of all God's creatures. They were expelled the regions of light, and with heaven lost their heavenly disposition, and fell into a settled rancour against God, and malice against men. What their offence was is difficult to determine, the scripture being silent about it. Some think envy, others unbelief; but most suppose it was pride. As to the time of their fall, we are certain it could not be before the sixth day of the creation, because on that day it is said, 'God saw every thing that he had made and behold it was very good;' but that it was not long after, is very probable, as it must have preceded the fall of our first parents. The number of the fallen angels seems to be great, and, like the holy angels, perhaps have various orders among them, Matt. xii.24 Eph ii.2. Eph, vi.12. Col ii.15. Rev. xii.7. Their constant employ is not only doing evil themselves, but endeavouring by all arts to seduce and pervert mankind., 1 Pet. v.8. Job i.6. It is supposed that they will be restrained during the Millennium, Rev. xx.2. but afterwards again for a short time, deceive the nations, Rev. xx.8, and then finally punished, Matt xxv.41. The authors who have written on this subject have been very numerous, we shall here only refer to a few: Reynold's Enquiry into the State and Economy of the Angelical World; Doddridge's Lect p.10. lect. 210-214; Milton's Paradise Lost; Bp. Newton's Works, vol iii. P. 538; 568; Shepherd of Angels; Gilpin on Temptation; Casmannon Anglographia; Gill and Ridgley's Bodies of Divinity.(19-20).

Title of Article: "Pre-existence of Jesus Christ"
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Battleboro, VT
Publisher: Fessenden and Co.
Date of Publication: 1836
Nature of Source: A 1275 page work "containing definitions of all religious terms; an impartial account of the principal Christian denominations that have existed in the world. . . with their doctrines, religious rites and ceremonies, as well as those of the Jews, Mohammedans, and heathen nations, together with the manners and customs of the East, illustrative of the holy scriptures, and a descriptions of the quadrupeds, birds, fishes, reptiles, insects, trees, plants, and minerals, mentioned in the Bible; a statement of the most remarkable. . . events in ecclesiastical history; biographical notices of the early martyrs and distinguished religious writers and characters of all ages. . . The whole brought down to the present time, and embracing, under one alphabet, the most valuable part of Calmet's and Brown's Dictionaries of the Bible; Buck's Theol. Dictionary; Abbott's Scripture Natural History; Wells' Geography of the Bible; Jones' Biographical Dictionary; and numerous other works. Designed as a complete book of reference on all religious subjects; and companion to the Bible; forming a cheap and compact library of religious knowledge" (title page).

Brown copied the excerpt below from Charles Buck's Theological Dictionary, the fifth American edition of which was published in 1818. Buck's entry on the "Pre-existence of Christ," however, was far more extensive; Brown copied only a portion of it. Comment: First, this entry cites John 3:13, 6:50, 17:1, and 8:58 and 1 John 1:4 as evidence of Christ's pre-existence. Second, it summarizes Watt's view that the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence explains ambiguities in Colossians 1:15 and in Genesis 1:2: it explains the "image" of a non-corporeal God by positing that the image referred to is that of "the God-man, to Christ in his pre-existent state" (Brown 964). Finally, the entry addresses six points of opposition to Christ's pre-existence; they affirm that the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ's human soul impinges his divine nature. These last points are interesting because they present the pre-existent soul in different senses: as a somewhat "human soul," as a "pre-existent intelligence" similar to "other intelligences called angels," as a "pure intelligent spirit," and as a "sublime human soul" (Brown 964). Some parts of this entry could imply that the pre-existent soul bears physical resemblance to humans. Finally, the entry acknowledges-but dismisses-theories about the pre-existence of all human souls.

Date of entry: July 5, 1999
Excerpt (pages): [Watt's arguments (as related in the entry, but not quoted directly)]: Since Christ's divine nature "is invisible in the Son as in the Father. . . [the passage referring to his 'image'] seems to refer to his pre-existent soul in union with the Godhead" (964). And "When man is said to be created in the image of God, (Gen. 1,2.) it may refer to the God-man, to Christ in his pre-existent state. God says, 'Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness.' The word is redoubled, perhaps to intimate that Adam was made in the likeness of the human soul of Christ, as well as that he bore something of the image and resemblance of the divine nature" (Brown 964).

Points of contention by those who feel the doctrine detracts from Christ's "personality":
"1. A pure intelligent spirit, say they, the first, the most ancient, and the most excellent of creatures, created before the foundation of the world, so exactly resembles the second person of the Arian trinity, that it is impossible to show the least difference, except in name.
"2. The pre-existent intelligence supposed in this doctrine is so confounded with those other intelligences called angels, that there is great danger of mistaking this human soul for an angel, and so making the person of Christ to consist of three natures.
"3. If Jesus Christ had nothing in common like the rest of mankind, except a body, how could this semi-conformity make him a real man?
"4. The passages quoted in proof of the pre-existence of the human soul of Jesus Christ are of the same sort with those which others allege in proof of the pre-existence of all human souls."
"5. This opinion, by ascribing the dignity of the work of redemption to his sublime human soul, detracts from the deity of Christ, and renders the last as passive as the first active.
"6. This notion is contrary to Scripture. St. Paul says, in all things it behooved him to be made like his brethren: he partook of all our infirmities, except sin. St. Luke says, he increased in stature and in wisdom, Heb. 2:17. Luke 2:52.

Worcester explains that one of Jehovah's purposes in creation was the eventual restoration of his creations to their former glory and happiness. (This restoration, however, was a necessary part of a larger and more important goal: to demonstrate God's ultimate goodness and wisdom. See Sermon I in this same book). Worcester also teaches that men will be redeemed to a state of glory higher than the angels, where they will "reign with him in heavenly glory."
reign with him in heavenly glory; while, as represented in the Revelation, the myriads of angels will stand round about, ministering to them, admiring the boundless grace displayed in their salvation, and assisting them, with their voices and their harps, in the extatick and immortal song of Moses and the Lamb”(41).

Topics: apostasy, sectarian strife, primitive church, new scripture, revelation
Author: Samuel Worcester
Title of Book: Sermons on Various Subjects, Practical and Doctrinal
Title of Article: "Sermon XXXIV: Great Question of Circumcision"
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Salem, Massachusetts
Publisher: Henry Whipple
Date of Publication: 1823
Nature of Source: A collection of 39 sermons by Samuel Worcester, Senior Pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Massachusetts. The sermons were edited and published by Henry Whipple after Worcester's death. Worcester was, according to the book's preface, best known for his position as Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but he gave many sermons before the public and had published some previous discourses which were "favourably received" (iii). Sermon XXXIV is based on Acts 15:30,31.

Comment: Worcester explains the New Testament controversy about circumcision and the Mosaic law by couching the debate in terms of salvation by works vs. salvation by grace. Most of the sermon, however, concerns church government and explains why Paul sought guidance about the Law of Moses from the elders and apostles at Jerusalem. The sermon also treats dissension in the primitive church, warns against the exercise of human ecclesiastical authority, rejects the idea that the primitive churches were linked by an ecclesiastical hierarchy, and briefly touches on justification through grace, not works.

The excerpt below argues that "no absolutely new opinion, whether right or wrong, respecting the faith in Christ, has been started, since the close of the scriptural canon" (430). Rather, in the days of the primitive church, all the possible problems that could arise, did. Consequently, apostasy in the early church was beneficial, since it allowed all problems to be definitively considered by the apostles. Worcester uses this argument to explain the diversity of denominations within Christianity. Worcester also expresses gratitude that these dissensions allowed "rules and precedents of sufficient authority" to be established for the duration of Christianity.

Excerpt (pages): "We are led to reflection of the early rise of errour among the professed believers of the gospel."
"Human nature has been the same in all ages. It has always been true, that vain man would be wise, though man be born like the wild ass's colt, and would reluctantly submit his understanding to the instruction of God. This being the fact, and as the apostolick times were to transmit instruction to the people of God in every succeeding period, it was wisely permitted that mistakes, disputes, and divisions, should gradually take place, in the primitive church. Had it not been so, we might not only have been discouraged by the great disparity between the first christians, and those who have lived since, but, for want of rules and precedents of sufficient authority, we should have been continually at a loss how to conduct ourselves, in regard to the various difficulties perpetually arising, and how to oppose and confute the diversified errors, which have appeared and been revived, during so many centuries. Divine wisdom, therefore, saw fit to suffer every false and dangerous notion by which the enemy of souls would at any time attempt to corrupt the simplicity of faith, to make its first entrance while the apostles were still living, that we might have their instructions and examples to guide us in every emergency. Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that no absolutely new opinion, whether right or wrong, respecting the faith in Christ, has been started, since the close of the scriptural canon. The gospel, that good and perfect gift, which came down from the Father of lights, has received no amendment from the hands through which it has successively passed. On the other hand, the grand deceiver, at the very beginning, exerted all his force against the gospel, and so fully availed himself of all his influence on the ignorance and wickedness of men, that he has since had no new devices to essay, no untried resources in reserve. Length of time, indeed, and change of circumstances, have afforded him opportunity for placing his delusions in various lights, and giving some of his schemes a seeming strength and establishment, which they had not at first; yet, no scheme or doctrine can be mentioned, which did not appear, though in its infantile state, or with less maturity, in the first age of christianity" (430-431).

Title of Book: The Travels of Cyrus: to Which Is Annexed, a Discourse upon the Theology and Mythology of the Pagans.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Manning and Loring, for S. Hall, etc.
Date of Publication: 1795
Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phonecia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Diroodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Comment: Ramsay speaks of an apostasy that occurred primarily because corrupt priests degraded divine truths by making them "too much corporealized." Throughout this work, Ramsay's characters are wary of "matter" and consistently reassert the fundamental differences between humans and the divine. These passages cast some doubt on John Brooke's assertion that Ramsay represents a "resynthesis of the hermetic tradition" which ostensibly preached human "divinization" and an "equation of spirit and matter" (The Refiner's Fire. 1996: 207, 28.)

Excerpt (pages): The ideas of the Chaldeans, etc. are "a fruitful source of luminous ideas, beautiful images and sublime expressions" like those in the scriptures and in Milton that were "too much corporalized" by the Egyptians' "sensible symbols" and that were "entirely mangled and degraded" by Greek and Roman poets (xv). "By this means a dark veil is drawn over the whole universe, the source of noble ideas is dried up, and reason becomes a barren field. The imagination, destitute of principles, seeks to supply its indigence, by creating a new world; it transforms all objects, in order to embellish them; it gives body to spirits, and spirit to bodies; it exalts men into gods and debases gods into men; its descriptions are florid, but false, and its marvellous degrades the divine nature; the agreeable and the gay take the place of the true sublime, and of that diviner poetry, which first leads man into his own heart, and then raises him above himself. Such is the Greek poesy, always poor in the midst of its seeming abundance. Had the author [Ramsay] been able to imitate it, it is what he ought to have avoided, as improper in a book of principles"(xv-xvi).
"Truth mixed with errors" (xiii).
Cyrus asks: why reduce sublime truths to outward worship? Pythagoras answers, "The corruption and avarice of the priests. . . is the source of all these mischiefs. The ministers of the gods, who were established at first to make men good, turn the priesthood into a vile trade; they only mind the outward flow of religion"(154).

The heavens declare the glory of God. The word heaven, in the plural heavens, is used in the scriptures in different senses. Sometimes it means that part of the universe, that glorious holy place, where Jehovah has fixed his more special abode, and where angels and glorified spirits dwell, in the imperishable mansions of bliss. Sometimes it means no more than the upper regions of our atmosphere, where the clouds are formed, or even where the birds, which thence are called birds of heaven, fly. And sometimes it means those higher and immeasurable regions, where the sun and the moon, the planets, and the countless hosts of the stars, with all their radiant glories, are displayed. In this last sense, evidently, the word heavens is used in our text. The heavens declare the glory of God. That is, the sun, the moon, the stars, all the stupendous orbs, which stud the lofty firmament, and which move and shine throughout the unmeasured regions of space, proclaim the existence, and show forth the perfections of the divine Creator" (18).

"Is there not a glorious display of divine wisdom in the general structure of the universe; in so disposing the vast orbs, which compose the great system, as that the sun shall preserve his station, and all the planets revolve around him, in the most perfect and harmonious order, and in all their revolutions, receive the immense benefit of his light and heat? Had not infinite wisdom been concerned in establishing the economy of the system, the sun and the planets might have been so disposed, as to have wandered without order, through the trackless regions of space, or so to interfere, as to dash one another in pieces, and produce universal confusion and ruin" (22).

Excerpt (pages): "Cyrus was overjoyed to see that all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200).

Three states of the world in all mythology: innocence, fall, restoration (222)

Cyrus speaking: "I farther observe, that the traditions of all nations foretell the coming of a hero, who is to descend from heaven to bring back Astrea to the earth. The Persians call him Mythras, the Egyptians Orus, the Tyrians Adonis, the Greeks Apollo, Hercules, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, the Conductor and Saviour" (222).
In opposition to the Deists: "the principal doctrines of revealed religion, concerning the states of innocence, corruption, and renovation, are as ancient as the world; that they were the foundations of Noah's religion; that he transmitted them to his children; that these traditions were thus spread throughout all nations; that the Pagans disfigured, degraded, and obscured them by their absurd fictions; and lastly, that these primitive truths have been no where preserved in their purity, except in the true religion" (xi). Ramsay hoped "to have given a plan of religion, equally amiable and reasonable, and to have shewn that its principles are beautiful, its consequence natural, and its original ancient: that it enlightens the mind, comforts the heart, and establishes the welfare of society" (xi).
Christian parallels in Greek and Roman writing:
1."That there is one supreme God, whom they every where call the Father, and the sovereign Lord of gods and men, the Architect of the world, the prince and governor of the universe, the first God, and the great God."
2."That universal nature is full of subordinate spirits, who are the ministers of that supreme God"
3."That good and evil, virtue and vice, knowledge and error, arise from the different influence and inspiration of the good and evil genii, who dwell in the air, the sea, the earth, and the heavens"(252).
Parallels among the Persians:
[At the wedding of Cyrus and Cassandra, they sing the tenets of the Ancient Persians:] "the love of Oromazes for his daughter Mythra before the beginning of time; the picture which she presented him, containing the ideas of all things; the production of unnumerable worlds resembling those ideas; the birth of the pure genii, appointed to inhabit these worlds; the revolt of Arimanius against the god Mythras; the origin of the chaos, and how it was reduced to order; the fall of spirits into mortal bodies; the labours of Mythras to raise them again to the Empyreum; and lastly, the total destruction of the evil principle, who diffuses every where hatred, discord, and the hellish passions" (44).

Topics: Christianization of ancient philosophy, creation, plurality of gods
Author: Joseph Priestley
Title of Book: Disquisitions Relating to Matter and Spirit. To Which is Added The History of the Philosophical Doctrine concerning the Origin of the Soul, and the Nature of Matter; with its Influence on Christianity, especially with respect to the Doctrine of the Pre-existence of Christ. Second edition, improved and enlarged.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Birmingham
Nature of Source: A two-volume work first written in London in 1777. Priestley (L.L.D., F.R.S.) was a prolific writer, producing treatises on electricity, vision, history, grammar, political science, and church authority and discipline, among other works. Here, Priestley espouses a Christian materialism that claims the "the proper unity of God. . . and the proper humanity of Christ" (iii). This massive "history of ideas" chronicles metaphysical debates about matter and spirit beginning in Eastern and Western antiquity.

Comment: These excerpts suggest the Christianization of ancient philosophies. In addition, the second excerpt is a creation myth that involves a premortal existence with a plurality of gods and an organization of chaotic matter.

Excerpt (pages): "Some of the Persians thought, that there were two gods, of different natures, the one good, called Horomazes, and the other evil, called Arimanius, the one resembling light, and the other darkness; and that in the medium between these was Mithras, who was therefore called the Mediator. This Mithras seems to correspond to the Birmah of the Hindoos, and the [Greek word] of Plato; being a peculiar emanation from the Deity, and employed by him in the formation of the world, and, therefore, was supposed by philosophizing christians to be the same with Christ" (317).

[Quoting Mosheim]: "According to the Oriental philosophers, the eternal nature, infinitely perfect, and infinitely happy, having dwelt from everlasting in profound solitude, produced at length from itself two minds of different sexes, which resembled the supreme parent in the most perfect manner. From the prolific union of these two beings arose others, which were also followed by succeeding generations; so that, in process of time, a celestial family was formed in the pleroma. This divine progeny being immutable in its nature, and above the power or mortality, was called by the philosophers aeon. How many in number these aeons were, was a point much controverted among the Oriental sages.'

"Beyond the mansions of light lies a rude mass of matter, agitated by innate, irregular motions. One of the celestial natures descending from the pleroma, either by a fortuitous impulse, or by the divine mind, reduced into order this unseemly mass, created men and inferior animals of different kinds, and corrected its malignity, by mixing with it a certain portion of divine light. This author of the world is distinguished from the supreme Deity by the name of demiurge. His character is a compound of shining qualities, and insupportable arrogance. He claims dominion over the new world he has formed, as his sovereign right, and excluding the Deity from all concern in it, demand from mankind, for himself and associates, divine honours.'

"This was the species of Oriental philosophy adopted by the early Gnostics, who maintained that this imperious demiurge was the god of the Jews, and the author of the law of Moses" (313-314).

"We have seen that it was a fundamental doctrine in the East, and likewise in the Platonic system, that, on account of the mixture of evil in the world, it could not be supposed to have been made by the supreme Being himself; but that it was formed from pre-existent matter, by a celestial spirit, a principal emanation from the divine mind, the Birmah of the Hindoos, the prima mens of the Chaldeans, the [Greek: nous and logos?] of Plato. And what was more natural than to suppose, that the restorer of the human race had been the former of it; especially as those who adopted that hypothesis could so plausibly apply to Christ, as we know they actually did, those passages of the Old Testament, in which the world was said to have been made by the word, . . . of God, the same word or power, which actually dwelled in Christ, and acted by him'(348-49).

Topics: Christianization of ancient philosophy, plurality of Gods, angels, intelligence and intelligences
Author: Stephen Bemrose
Title of Book: Dante's Angelic Intelligences: Their Importance in the Cosmos and in Pre-Christian Religion.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Rome, Italy
Publisher: Edizioni Di Storia E Letteratura
Date of Publication: 1983
Nature of Source: A Letture Di Pensiero E D'Arte. It examines Dante's "conception of the nature and role of secondary causes" (9)-i.e., Intelligences or angels--and aims to "situate as precisely as possible the Dantean conceptions under discussion in relation to the philosophical traditions and problems of the time"(10). Bemrose discusses historical philosophies of intelligences, angels, and polytheistic deities and examines how they relate to each other and to Dante's cosmology.
Comment: Unlike most other 13th-century Christians, Dante does not dismiss "pagan" gods; rather, he considers them (even the Olympians) angelic beings or "veiled Intelligences" and so, in a sense, "Christianizes" Greek and Roman myth. On the other hand, one excerpt below relates an instance when another writer tries to do just the opposite and demonstrate polytheism in the Bible.
Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist
Date of entry: July 16, 1999
Excerpt (pages): "One of the most characteristic features of Dante's attitude to antiquity is his insistence upon some sort of parallel between the history of the Jewish people and that of the other 'chosen people,' the Romans. The parallel is not just political. . . ; it is also religious. . . . What needs to be investigated further is the extent to which Dante recognised a substratum of veracity in the ancient myths, and the possible connexions, in his view, between mythology and a sphere of angelic activity in our world (both via the heavens and otherwise"(118). In his Divine Comedy, Dante created an "indirect equation between Christian angels and pagan gods"(119). "According to Renucci, Dante sees the Graeco-Roman gods and goddesses as nothing other than veiled Intelligences"(120). [See discussion of Capaneus, damned because he blasphemes against Jupiter (127) and Aeneas's heroic/prophetic descent into the underworld (138).]
Dante is seemingly unique among medieval philosophers in connecting pagan mythology and good angels (176). Dante suggests that "one of the ways in which the ancients glimpsed the true God's operations was through the activities of his angels, activities which lay behind many of the myths of Greece and Rome"(178). Dante "must be reckoned among the most enthusiastic and thorough-going Christian adaptors of pagan philosophy"(180).

"Later Graeco-Roman religion-and precisely those forms of it that had become infused with oriental beliefs-already contained notable elements of syncretism between gods and angelic beings"(171). [I.e. Michael the archangel is associated with Mercury; See examples of syncretic iconography on pages 172-174.]

[Paganization of Christian texts]: Third-century author (perhaps Porphyry) argues that, like Athene and Minerva, there is no real different between "the Christian angels and the gods of various pagan religions"(175). "The author wishes to show that the Christians also believe in many gods (although they call them angels), and in IV, qu. 23. he goes on to quote various biblical texts which appear to show that even according to the Old and New Testaments there is more than one god"(175).

Title of Article: "Sermon XXXIV: Great Question of Circumcision"

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Salem, Massachusetts

Nature of Source: A collection of 39 sermons by Samuel Worcester, Senior Pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Massachusetts. The sermons were edited and published by Henry Whipple after Worcester's death. Worcester was, according to the book's preface, best known for his position as Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but he gave many sermons before the public and had published some previous discourses which were "favourably received" (iii). Sermon XXXIV is based on Acts 15:30,31.

Comment: Worcester explains the New Testament controversy about circumcision and the Mosaic law by couching the debate in terms of salvation by works vs. salvation by grace. Most of the sermon, however, concerns church government and explains why Paul sought guidance about the Law of Moses from the elders and apostles at Jerusalem. The sermon also treats dissension in the primitive church, warns against the exercise of human ecclesiastical authority, rejects the idea that the primitive churches were linked by an ecclesiastical hierarchy, and briefly touches on justification through grace, not works.
The following excerpts focus on statements about church government in both the primitive and contemporary church. In part, they are a defense against those that held that congregationalist churches "are in a state of anarchy; without government—without discipline,—without order" (436). Interestingly, Worcester quotes a Dr. Mosheim, who asserts that the primitive church never had a tight ecclesiastical order. Worcester emphasizes the fact the Paul went to Jerusalem by revelation, not by protocol.

Excerpt (pages): "The simple question was, whether sinful men were to be justified by the deeds of the law, or by the merits of Christ; to be saved by works, or by grace. This question, after long and strenuous debate, was determined to refer to the apostles and elders at Jerusalem. Not that they were higher in inspiration or authority than Paul, for he was not a whit behind the chiefest of the apostles. But it was from them that the false teachers professedly come; and, according to their doctrine, doubtless, they pretended to preach. And, though these false teachers would not yield to Paul, who, as the principal preacher to the Gentiles, was particularly concerned in the question, and whose apostolick character they probably did not acknowledge; it might be supposed that they would readily submit to the judgment or the apostles of the circumcision. Paul also says, in the passage quoted from his epistle to the Galatians, that he went up to Jerusalem, at this time, by revelation. It was, therefore, by the express direction of the Spirit of God, that the question was carried for decision there"(426).
"In order, therefore, that the great question might be properly settled, it was found necessary to have it considered in a general meeting. I say, a general meeting; for it should be noted, that not only the apostles and elders, but the multitude of the brethren were present" (427).
"Errour is to be put down, and difficulties in churches are to be healed, not by human authority, but by arguments and means supplied by the word of God.
"Paul and Barnabas did not exercise authority over the false brethren, who troubled the church of Antioch; they did not require them to submit to assertions, opinions, or judgments, authoritatively or dogmatically pronounced. But they disputed with them; they reasoned and endeavoured to show them the truth, by what God had revealed. At Jerusalem, also, when the question came before the apostles, and elders, and brethren there, it was open for discussion, and made a subject of free debate; and it was finally decided, not by apostolick or ecclesiastical authority, but by fair argument from the sure testimony of God. This is particularly observable; sure, if it could ever be proper, in a case of religious controversy, for any men, or body of men, to pronounce an authoritative decision, it certainly would have been so, in this memorable instance. The apostles were the highest officers of the church of Christ; the elders at Jerusalem were eminently distinguished in character and in gifts; and the multitude of the brethren were assembled with them on the occasion. Yet the whole business was conducted, not in the way of authority, but of persuasion. It is observable, also that while the errour of the Judaizers was refuted and exploded, and their conduct was disowned and disapproved; yet against them no harshness or bitterness, was shown; no anathemas, or denunciations, were uttered" (433-434).
"... And since, in the wisdom of God, things were so ordered in the apostolick age, as to afford occasion for instruction and example, suited to every case which might arise in the church; how much better it would be for all ministers and christians sacredly to conform to them, than to adopt rules and methods of a different character, and of questionable expediency! How much better, than to put down errour, and to silence controversy, by the authority of great names, or of high toned decisions-by violent denunciations in the unadvised recommendations of books, or in the unauthorised acts of clerical or ecclesiastical bodies!

"The assembly at Jerusalem affords no precedent, or warrant, for the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of councils or synods" (434)

"The churches, in these early times,' says Dr. Mosheim, 'were entirely independent, none of them subject to any foreign jurisdiction, but each one governed by its own rules, and its own laws. For, though the churches founded by the apostles had this particular deference shown to them, that they were consulted in difficult and doubtful cases, yet they had no juridical authority, no sort of supremacy over the others, nor the least right to enact laws for them. Nothing, on the contrary, is more evident, than the perfect equality which reigned among the primitive churches; nor does there ever appear, in the first century, the smallest trace of that association of provincial churches, from which Councils and Metropolitans derived their origin. The meeting of the church of Jerusalem, mention in the xvth of Acts, is commonly considered as the first christian council; but this notion arises from a manifest abuse of the word council." (435-436).

"The constitution of the primitive churches was simple; yet these churches had the most excellent spirit of life, and beauty of form. . . . There are forms of church government, there are ecclesiastical establishments, which might be maintained with a very sightly exterior, though the spirit of the gospel should be nearly extinct. Not such is the congregational form. This, like a republican government, can be supported only by virtue. . . . Instead of seeking for an ecclesiastical establishment of imposing exterior, and compulsive energy; let us labour, by all scriptural means, for the increase of pure and undefiled religion; for the promotion of sound faith, of true charity, of internal discipline and purity. "The vital principle of true church government is the spirit of holy love, or genuine christian fellowship." (437).

Comment: The excerpts below include many creation myths cited by Priestley (Cf. Ramsay, The Travels of Cyrus (1795). Priestley refers to some of Ramsay's earlier work.) The first paragraph argues against creation ex nihilo and gives an "ancient" definition of "creation." Accounts of the myths themselves deal with the creation and ultimate fate of intelligences (including the devil and Christ) and the nature of spirit and matter.

Excerpt (pages): "It will throw considerable light upon this subject, to reflect, that it was a maxim with all the ancients, even till the time of the later christian Fathers and schoolmen, though I believe it to be false in itself, that nothing could be made out of nothing. Ex nihilo nihil fit. In fact, the idea of creation, in the modern sense of the word, never occurred to them; they always meaning by it only a forming, or new modeling of things; and in this sense their maxim was true, for a carpenter must be provided with wood before he can make any instrument of wood. The ancients, therefore, in general, supposed that two distinct things, or principles, had been from eternity, viz. matter and spirit, or God, and since inferior intelligences could not, in their opinion, be made from nothing, any more than gross bodies, the universal opinion was, that they were emanations from the supreme mind. And, as they generally considered the Divine Being as a fire, or light, they explained the production of minds by the lighting of one candle at another, or by some other comparison of the same nature. . . . [T]hey could not, in reality, consider the Divine Being as strictly speaking, without extension, indivisible, or indiscerptible, which is essential to proper immateriality. In fact, by such terms as spiritual, incorporeal, &c. as was observed before, they could only mean a more subtle and refined kind of matter, such as air, flame, light, &c.(216-17).

[Hindu followers of the doctrine of the Bedang believed]: "God seeing the earth in full bloom called forth intellect, which he endued with various organs and shapes, to form a diversity of animals upon the earth. Intellect is a portion of the great soul of the universe, breathed into all creatures, to animate them for a certain time. . . . when they are arrived at a state of purity, they are absorbed into God. This absorbed state is a participation of the divine nature, where consciousness is lost in bliss. . . God will then exist alone, for matter will be totally annihilated"(308-09).

Mosheim: "'According to the Oriental philosophers, the eternal nature, infinitely perfect, and infinitely happy, having dwelt from everlasting in profound solitude, produced at length from itself two minds of different sexes, which resembled the supreme parent in the most perfect manner. From the prolific union of these two beings arose others, which were also followed by succeeding generations; so that, in process of time, a celestial family was formed in the pleroma. "This was the species of Oriental philosophy adopted by the early Gnostics, who maintained that this imperious demiurge was the god of the Jews, and the author of the law of Moses"(313-314).

"It is . . . a very ancient opinion among very catholic authors, that the first intelligent being that God made was the devil; he being the first of those intelligences that God created an infinite number of ages before the creation of the visible world, at which time, and not before, Christ was produced"(354).

"Plato thought that all evil came from matter, and that its imperfection was eternal and incorrigible. It was a maxim with him, that an eternal being can produce nothing but an eternal being, and that corporeal and frail beings are the production of inferior intelligences. He, therefore, makes the angels of the planets to be the formers of the human body"(389).

Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phoenecia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Dirodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Comment: Explains the history of "elders" in the Jewish and Apostolic churches and comments on late eighteenth/ early nineteenth century interpretations of the office.

Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist
Elder: an overseer, ruler, leader. Elders, or seniors, in ancient Jewish polity, were persons the most considerable for age, experience, and wisdom. Of this sort were the 70 men whom Moses associated with himself in the government; such likewise afterwards were those who held the first mark in the synagogue as presidents.-Elders, in church history, were originally those who held the first place in the assemblies of the primitive Christians. The word presbyter is often used in the New Testament in this signification; hence the first councils of Christians were called Presbytery, or council of elders.-Elders, in the Presbyterian discipline, are officers who, in conjunction with the ministers and deacons, compose the kirk sessions, who formerly used to inspect and regulate matters of religion and discipline; but whose principal business now is to take care of the pool's funds. They are chosen from among the people, and are received publicly with some degree of ceremony. In Scotland there is an indefinite number of elders in each parish, generally about twelve. See PRESBYTERIANS.

"It has long been a matter of dispute, whether there are any such officers as lay-elders mentioned in scripture. On the one side it is observed, that these officers are not anywhere mentioned as being alone or single, but always as being many in every congregation. They are also mentioned separately from the brethren. Their office, more than once, is described as being distinct, from that of preaching, not only in ROM xii. Where he that ruleth is expressly distinguished from him that exhorteth, or teacheth, but also in the passage, 1 Tim. V. 17. On the other side it is said, that from the above-mentioned passages, nothing can be collected with certainty to establish this opinion; neither can it be inferred from any other passage that churches should be furnished with such officers, though perhaps prudence, in some circumstances, may make them expedient. 'I incline to think,' says Dr. Guise, on the passage, 1 Tim. V.17 'that the apostle intends only preaching elders, when he directs double honour to be paid to the elders that rule well, especially those who labour in the word and doctrine; and that the distinction lies not in the order of officers, but in the degree of their diligence, faithfulness, and eminence in laboriously fulfilling their ministerial work; and so the emphasis is to be laid on the word labour in the word and doctrine, which has an especially annexed to it"(137).
It was the opinion of Bardesanes, that Adam at first had no body, but what was subtle, and agreeable to his nature, and that he had a carnal body given him after his fall. According to Manes, marriage was the sin of Adam and Eve. That the woman was the tree of knowledge, was the opinion of many of the Rabbin's. And Clemens Alexandrines says, that the sin of Adam was his anticipating his commerce with Eve. Marriage, however, was not absolutely forbidden by the Manicheans; but only to the elect, while it was permitted to those they called auditors.

In the very early times of Christianity, the bishops and doctors, notwithstanding the warnings of the apostles on this very head, magnified celibacy to the skies, and vilified marriage as much. Justin Martyr believed that Christ was born of a virgin, to show that God could provide for the continuance of the human race, without the union of the two sexes. Austin was much inclined to the same opinion. He believed that Adam would never have known Eve, if he had continued immortal. Gregory Nyssenus held that, in a state of innocence, there would have been no generation, but that men would have been multiplied by some other means. And many of the Fathers were divided in their opinion, whether marriage was necessary to the propagation of the human race.

Justin Martyr says, that Christianity has dissolved marriage, which lust had rendered criminal. Origen says, that a man cannot approach his wife without defiling himself, and that this impurity does not permit a man to present himself before God, or pray to him. Methodius says, that since Christ has introduced virginity, the reign of the devil is destroyed; whereas, before this enemy of the human race kept it in captivity; so that none of the ancients could please God. They were under the empire and dominion of their sins(398).

Jews: Maimonides says, that all impediments and obstacles which hinder men in their progress towards perfection, and all sin, come only from the part of matter. He also says, that matter is to be understood by the adulterous woman, in the book of Proverbs, seducing a young man to criminal conversation with her(389-90).
Joseph Priestley espouses a Christian materialism that claims the "proper unity of God. . . and the proper humanity of Christ"(iii). This massive "history of ideas" chronicles metaphysical debates about matter and spirit beginning in Eastern and Western antiquity. The excerpt below addresses the eternal nature of pre-existent souls. Cf. Joseph Smith's statement in the King Follet Discourse ("That which has a beginning may have an end") with Cicero's alleged statement.

ETERNITY, with respect to God, is a duration without beginning or end. As it is the attribute of human nature, it is a duration that has a beginning, but will never have an end" (143). "ETERNITY OF GOD is the perpetual continuance of his being, without beginning, end or succession." [Exodus 3:14; Romans 1:20; Acts 15:18; Psalm ciii.17; Jer. 31:3; Isaiah 25:1; Eph. 3:11 Romans 9:11 Eph. 1:4; 2 Sam 23:5 Mic. 5:2; Romans 1:23; Romans 9:5; 2 Peter 1:24-5; Mal 3:6; Psalm cii 26-7; Jer 10:10; Psalm 10:16; Daniel 4:3.] "That he is without succession, or any distinctions of time succeeding one to another as moments, minutes, &c., may be proved from, 1. His existence before such were in being, Isa. xliii.13.-2. The distinctions and differences of time are together ascribed to him, and not as succeeding one another: he is the same yesterday, today, and for ever, Heb. xiii.3. Rev. i.4.-3. If his duration were successive, or proceeded by moments, days, and years, then there must have been some first moment, day and year, when he began to exist, which is incompatible with the idea of his eternity: and, besides, one day would be but one day with him, and not a thousand, contrary to the express language of scripture, 2 Pet. iii.8.-4. He would not be immense, immutable, and perfect, if this were the case; for he would be older one minute that he was before, which cannot be said of him.-5. His knowledge proves him without successive duration, for he knows all things past, present, and to come: 'He sees the present without a medium the past without recollection, and the future without foresight. To him all truths are but one idea, all places but one point, and all times but one moment.'" (143-144). [Gill's Body of Divinity; Paley's Nat. Theol., P.480; Charnock on the Divine Perfections; Clarke on ditto; Watt's Ontology, chap. Iv.]

That the whole system of the universe had a beginning is clear, both from the deductions of reason, and the declarations of scripture. The notion of some of the ancient, and of some of the modern philosophers, that the universe existed from eternity, is as chimerical and absurd, as it is repugnant to the oracles of divine truth. When, in the light of history sacred and profane, we look back upon past ages and generations, we cannot but see the most plenary evidence, that this world, with all it contains, the race of mankind, and the various animal tribes, had a beginning; we cannot, indeed, but see evidence, that the beginning of the world could not have been earlier than what, according to the scripture chronology, it is made out to have been, that is, somewhat less than six thousand years ago. Besides, to suppose that this world, and all other worlds, that the race of mankind, and all other races and orders of beings, throughout the universe, have existed from eternity, involves the greatest possible absurdities and contradictions. The world, then, the earth and the heavens, and the whole system of nature, had a beginning.

"Before creation was begun, Jehovah inhabited eternity, independently and perfectly blessed in the infinite benevolence of his nature, in his unchangeable purposes, and in the contemplation of the wonderful works, which, for the glory of his name, he would, in their due order perform" (19).

"... At his omnifick word, the immense chaotick mass of matter, of which unnumbered worlds were to be made, sprang from nothing into being; from this chaotick mass, the sun, the moon, the earth, and all the planetary globes, were formed; the sun was fixed in his place, as the common centre of the system, and the earth and all the planets, thrown forth from the plastick hand of their Creator into their several orbits, commenced their stupendous revolutions"(19-20).

"As he is the universal Spirit, who sustains and actuates the whole created universe, intellectual and material; as he rules in the heavens and governs throughout all worlds, and according to his sovereign pleasure, and in such a manner that not a sparrow can fall to the ground, . . . we may rest in the fullest assurance, that nothing ever does, that nothing ever will take place, which is not, on the whole, subservient to the highest general good, and to the furtherance of the best interests of all who love him"(28-29).

Title of Article: "Four Extremes"

Title of Periodical: The Morning Star and City Watchman

Place of Publication: Boston, Massachusetts

Nature of Source: Periodical published monthly by Elias Smith, an Elder in the Christian Church and "Minister of the New Testament," who was born June 17, 1769." Smith started the first "religious newspaper" in the United States, The Herald of Gospel Liberty, in 1809. He established The Morning Star and City Watchman to "give the best and most correct knowledge of the things of God and Christ"(6) and to "expose error, to give the truth in its original simplicity,-to distinguish between the righteous and the wicked, between the doctrines and commands of men, and. . . of Christ; and to keep back nothing profitable as to doctrine, reproof, instruction in righteousness. . . " (24).

Comment: Advocates a gathering into the Church of Christ as "the centre of gravitation" in the midst of Calvinists, Unitarians, Arminians, and Universalists. Smith explains that each of these sects are in error: Calvinism is too cold and indifferent; Unitarianism denies the divinity of Christ, Arminianism "makes salvation rather uncertain to any man," and Universalism caters to deists and the man who "does not follow Christ's instructions [and] finds his works are not such as he may be safe in doing" (18). Smith calls for people to reject sectarian divisions ("idols") and "come unto Mount Zion," declaring, as those in the primitive church did, that "Christ is all" (18-19).

"My Brethren! Look at these things, and run from these extremes to this centre of gravitation, where God, Angels, Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles meet. Thus will you 'come unto Mount Zion, to an innumerable company of angels;--to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven; and to God, the Judge of all, and to the Spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than the blood of Abel" (19-20). Author: E. Bickersteth

Title of Book: The Mind of Christ Respecting the Jews

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: H.B. Pratt

Date of Publication: 1845

Nature of Source: Bickersteth was the Rector of Herts, England. This 20-page tract was first printed in England in the Literalist, October 1, 1840. It is reprinted here as No. 1 in a series called the "Millenarian Library" and is included on a microfilm collection of the works of Early Adventist, or Post-Millerite, groups from 1844-1870. See Ronald L. Numbers and Jonathan M. Butler, eds, The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987). This text is based in part on Isaiah lxii. 1,2.

Comment: This reprint discusses scriptural evidence of what God will do for the Jews when he gathers them in "the last times" and states the evangelical responsibilities such promises place on Christians. The first paragraph below is part of a preface added by L.B.C., the editor; the paragraphs that follow are by Bickersteth.

"What remains now to be fulfilled concerning them [the Jews], is their gathering again, for the purposes which God has specified in his word; this part of the prophecies is now beginning to be fulfilled; these are the last of all the prophecies which precede the glorious appearance of their DAVID to reign over them. . . . Professing Christians sometimes ask, 'What have we to do with these things, provided they are true?' I answer: we have much to do; we have a responsibility with all the revealed word that relates to the present and the future. God does not lay these things before us but for our instruction. If it is his purpose to do as he has said he would do, 'Gather them out of all countries whither they have been scattered,--pour out upon them a spirit of grace and supplication,—remove the partial blindness which has happened unto them, by pouring his spirit upon them,' shall we idly look on? While Christ will not rest till these things be accomplished, shall we, who profess to have his sympathies, take our ease in Zion? No, no; let us toil on till Christ has seen of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied." (L.B.C., ed.)

"The testimony of the scriptures is very full that the conversion, restoration, and future glory of the Jews will be the means which God will use for the universal conversion of the Gentiles to Christ. . . . We owe the present diffusion of the Gospel to the casting away of the Jews; but their restoration shall be as life from the dead to the whole world. Now Christ is the light of the Gentiles, but so greatly will he manifest himself that he will be the glory of his people, and through them bless the whole earth.

". . . If there be such glories come to our world through the Jews, the deepest and highest benevolence to your fellow-men calls you to help in their conversion and salvation"(18-19).

"HERMIANI, a sect in the second century; so called from their leader Hermias. One of their distinguishing tenets was, that God is corporeal; another, that Jesus Christ did not ascend into heaven with his body but left it in the sun" (184).

Excerpt (pages): "The Cabalists. . . say that all creatures are emanations from the eternal Being [the Holy Ghost, or spirit of God], and that the attributes of the Deity being infinite, may produce an infinity of effects. It is extended when this substance composes spirits, and contracted when it makes matter, so that it is evident, they could have no notion of any thing properly immaterial."(218).

Topics: God's body, spirit and matter, intelligences, light of Christ, creation, plurality of gods

Author: Joseph Priestley

Title of Book: Disquisitions Relating to Matter and Spirit. To Which is Added The History of the Philosophical Doctrine concerning the Origin of the Soul, and the Nature of Matter; with its Influence on Christianity, especially with respect to the Doctrine of the Pre-existence of Christ. Second edition, improved and enlarged.

Comment: These excerpts present various ideas about God's materiality. Some passages associate "extension," and therefore materiality, to God. Others make a distinction between matter and corporeality or postulate God to be composed of a substance like light. The concluding paragraphs depict god in an explicitly corporeal form.
Manichean] imagined that there was a spiritual matter, out of which God made souls, which agrees with the notion above-mentioned of the Jewish Cabalists"(219).

"God, angels, and daemons, says Porphyry and Jamblichus, are made of matter, but have no relation to what is corporeal"(220).

"The ablest and most orthodox christian Fathers, [Beausobre] says, always say that God is a light, and a sublime light, and that all the celestial powers which surround the Deity are lights of a second order, rays of the first light. This is the general style of the Fathers before and after the council of Nice. The word, they say, is a light, that is come into the world, proceeding from the self-existent light, and emanation of light from light.

"The Christians, says the same writer, who were always unanimous with respect to the unity of God, were by no means so with respect to his nature. The scriptures not being explicit on the subject, each adopted what he thought the most probably opinion, or that of the philosophical school in which he had been educated. Thus an Epicurean who embraced christianity was inclined to clothe the Deity with a human form, a Platonist said that God was incorporeal, and a Pythagorean that he was an intelligent light, or fire. Another imagined, that the essence of God was corporeal, but subtle, and ethereal, penetrating all bodies. Another, with Aristotle, that it had nothing in it of the elements that composed this world, but believed it to be of a fifth nature"(224).

"The Indian philosophers, says Beausobre, think, that the Deity has a luminous body, invisible as present, because it is concealed behind another, either the heavens, or the world; but, that it will be revealed (i.e. become visible) some time"(217-218).

"The divine fire, the Magi say, was distributed to all creatures, and before all to the prima mens, as the oracles of Zoroaster teach, and then to other eternal and incorporeal natures, in which class are included innumerable inferior gods, angels, good demons, and the souls of men.

"To come to the Greek philosophy, we find that Pythagoras, after the Magi, says that God, in his body, resembles light, and in his soul truth"(218-219).

[Priestley quotes Mrs. Carter speaking of the Stoics (from her dissertation prefixed to her Translation of Epictetus)]: "They sometimes define God to be an intelligent fiery spirit, without form, but passing into whatever things it pleases, and assimilating itself to all; sometimes an active operative fire. They, moreover, expressly speak of God as corporeal, which is objected to them by Plutarch. Indeed, they define all essence to be body. They held the eternity of matter, as a passive principle, but that was reduced into form by God, and that the world was made, and is continually governed by him. They imagined the whole universe to be peopled with gods and daemons, and among other divinities they reckoned the sun, moon, and stars, which they conceived to be animated and intelligent, or inhabited by particular deities, as the body is by the soul, who presided over them, and directed their motions"(221-222).

"When I, [Beausobre] adds, consider with what confidence Tertullian, who thought that God was corporeal, and figured, speaks of this opinion, it makes me suspect that it must have been the general opinion of the Latin church. Who can deny, says he, that God is a body, though he is a spirit? Every spirit is a body, and has a form proper to it. Melito [Bishop of Sardis], so much boasted of for his virtues and knowledge, composed a treatise to prove that God is corporeal"(224).

"Origen says, that every spirit, according to the proper and simple notion of the word, signifies a body. This is confirmed by Chalcidius. The idea of a spirit, according to the ancients, was nothing but an invisible, living, thinking, free and immortal being, which has within itself the principle of its actions and motions" (227).

"If the modern metaphysicians be shocked at what he has heard already, what will he say of the Anthropomorphites, who maintained, that God had even a human form? and yet Beausobre says, that this error is so ancient, that it is hardly possible to find the origin of it. They supposed that God had a body, subtle like light, but with organs exactly like the human body, not for necessity, but for ornament, believing it to be the most excellent if all forms. This opinion must have been very common in the east. The contrary opinion was even considered as heresy, because it was the opinion of Simon Magus" (227).

There have been warm debates between the Greek and Latin churches about the words hypostasis and persona; the Latin concluding that the word hypostasis signified substance or essence, thought to assert that there were three divine hypostases was to say that there were three Gods. On the other hand, the Greek church thought that the word person did not sufficiently guard against the Sabellian notion of the same individual Being sustaining three relations" (383). Title of Book: The Conflict of Ages; or, the Great Debate on the Moral Relations of God and Man. Fifth Edition.

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston and London

Publisher: Phillips, Sampson & Co.; Sampson Low, Son & Co.

Date of Publication: 1854

Nature of Source: This 552 page book was first published 1853 and, according to Jacob Blain's review (A Review, Giving the Main Ideas in Dr. Edward Beecher's Conflict of Ages: And a Reply to Them, and Also to the Views of His Reviewers, n.p: n.p, 1853?), was in its fifth edition only three months after it was published (Blain 2). The book's purpose is to show how the doctrine of the "native and original depravity of man" can be understood "as not to be inconsistent with the highest principles of honor and right" (Beecher 2,4). Beecher reviews theories about the Divine nature, human nature, and the fall, and suggests that a conscious fall in a pre-existent state would make humans-not God-culpable for their inherent depravity. Beecher is the son of Dr. Lyman Beecher and brother of Henry Ward Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Comment: Beecher gives examples of many church fathers regarding infant sin and baptism; he maintains that their remarks about the innocent natures of children are a part of their defense against the Gnostic heretics, who held that matter was the cause of evil. Cf. D&C 29:46-50; Moroni 8:12.

Excerpt (pages): "[B]y their opposition to the Gnostic and Manichean dogmas concerning natures essentially evil, [the early fathers] were, in fact, led definitely to deny the existence of a sinful nature in man. Hence, Gregory of Nyssa, in his work concerning children prematurely removed, says, 'The child, free from all sin, finds itself in the natural state, and needs no purification for its health, because it has as yet fallen into no disease of the soul.' (Emerson's Wiggers, p. 346.) Chrysostom also says, 'We baptize children, though they have no sin, that they may have holiness.' &c. At the same time, they did not deny that all men do in fact sin, and thus, becoming guilty and corrupt, need the atonement of Christ. Moreover, in general they held that the sin of Adam, in some way, had so affected his race that it stood connected with this result. Still, however, they considered the only immediate effects of this sin to be natural death, a higher degree of sensual excitability, and exposure to a higher power of temptation" (270).

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Providence, Rhode Island Publisher: Bennett Wheeler
Date of Publication: 1786
Nature of Source: This tract is one of several published by Winchester, who lived from 1751-1797. Like this one, his other tracts—such as Divinity of Christ, proved from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, in several letters to a Friend (Boston 1786)—rely heavily on scriptural citations and are carefully footnoted. This particular tract is a 64 page collection of scripture passages "[disposed] under proper heads, so as to form one continued discourse" (vii). Aside from an introductory section in which Winchester explains the themes of his five different "chapters," the scriptures are presented without interpretation or connecting prose (although Winchester does explore some ideas in footnotes, as when he compares "punishment of sin" with "punishment for sin" in the notes of pages 33-40). Several sections are based almost entirely on the Book of Revelations or Psalms, and others rely heavily on Isaiah and Jeremiah. Overall, it is an optimistic work that advocates universal praise of God for his promise of "universal salvation" to all that "overcome." The work is meant for a non-denominational audience (Section Four is a Thanksgiving liturgy "suitable for any Christian congregation").

Comment: "Intelligences" is mentioned only in the subtitle of this tract, which refers to the "final reestablishment of lapsed intelligences" (title page). This usage is clarified by the subhead of Section Five. That passage identifies the section as "[a] collection of scripture passages, wherein the most terrible Judgements are threatened, and the greatest Mercies promised to the same People, and Persons: all tending to prove not only the certainty of an exact Retribution to all the Workers of Iniquity, but also their final Restoration, after they have received, and accepted of the Punishment of their Sins, and are cured of their vicious Habits" (33; my italics). The "lapsed intelligences" of the subtitle seem to be synonymous with "people," "persons," and "workers of iniquity" in this later passage: all are the object of a "restoration" from sin. In this sense, "intelligences" refers to humans as sentient beings of this earth who have the capacity to choose and to change. "Intelligence" is a general characteristic of these beings, not necessarily an eternal entity unto itself or a unique component of any individual.

Author: Andrew Michael Ramsay (Chevalier Ramsay)
Title of Book: The Travels of Cyrus: to Which Is Annexed, a Discourse upon the Theology and Mythology of the Pagans.

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Manning and Loring, for S. Hall, etc.

Date of Publication: 1795

Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phoenicia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Diodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Comment: This group of excerpts demonstrates the ways in which Ramsay uses "intelligences" throughout the book. In addition, it provides information on the characteristics of both finite spirits and the great Sovereign Intelligence. Also included is a discussion of the relationship between pure spirit, its "subtle vehicle," and its physical body-perhaps similar to ideas of intelligences, spirit body, and mortal body in Mormon thought. Included in these excerpts is also a reported Hebrew myth about premortal life.

Date of entry: July 14, 1999

Excerpt (pages): Ramsay desires to show that "all nations had originally the same fundamental principles, that the duties of religion, morality, and good policy flow from the same source, conspire to the same end, and mutually support and fortify each other; and in a word, that all the evil and human virtues, the laws of nature and nations are, so to speak, but consequences of THE LOVE OF ORDER, which is the eternal and universal law of all intelligences" (xv).

Orientals, Chaldeans, and Hebrews "painted nature without disguising it, and gave life to everything without deifying it. According to them everything proceeds from God, and ought to flow back to him again. All the visible wonders of nature are faint images of his greatness, and the unnumerable orders of spirits emanations from his wisdom. Mankind are all but one family of that immense republic of intelligences, of which God is the common Father. Each man is a ray of light separated from its source, strayed into a corner of disordered nature, tossed about by the tumultuous wind of passion, transported from climate to climate by restless desires, purified by all the misfortunes it meets with, till it becomes like a subtle vapor reascending to the superior regions from whence it fell" (xv).

"The notion of a spirit contributed by the Supreme God to be the head and guide of all spirits, is very ancient. The Hebrew doctors believed that the soul of the Messias was created from the beginning of the world, and appointed to preside over all the orders of intelligences. This opinion was founded on a notion, that finite natures cannot incessantly contemplate the original brightness and glories of the divine essence; and must necessarily sometimes turn off their view and adore the Creator in his works, that at such times there must be an head to lead spirits through all the regions of immensity, and shew them all its beauties and wonders"(250).

Speaking of the human body (Zororaster speaking): "nothing but a sovereign Intelligence could produce, adjust and preserve so compounded, so delicate, and so admirable a machine" (56).

Persian hymn sung during sacrifice: "Oromazes is the first of incorruptible natures, eternal, unbegotten, self-sufficient, of all that's excellent most excellent, the wisest of all intelligences; he beheld himself in the mirror of his own substance, and by that view produced the goddess Mythra, Mythra the living image of his beauty, the original mother and the immortal virgin; she presented him the ideas of all things, and he gave them to the god Mythras to form a world resembling those ideas..."(62).

Oromazes is the "first principle" of all things (64). "In the spaces of the empyreum a pure and divine fire expands itself; by means of which, not only bodies, but spirits become visible. In the midst of this immensity is the great Oromazes, first principle of all things. He diffuses himself every where; but it is there that he is manifested in a more glorious manner. Near him is seated the god Mythras, or the second spirit, and under him Psyche, or the goddess Mythra; around their throne, in the first rank, are the Jyngas, the most sublime intelligences; in the lower spheres are an endless number of genii of all the different orders" (64).

Pythagoras: "You cannot deny that there are in nature beings who suffer, and others that do not suffer; intelligences that are ignorant, and other who have knowledge; some who deny, others who affirm, and others who doubt of the same things; intelligences who love and hate the same objects, and who often change their thoughts, sentiments, and passions. Now is it conceivable that the same immutable, immense, infinite substance should be at the same time knowing and ignorant, happy and unhappy, a friend and an enemy of its own nature?"(169). "What motive is it that could induce you to prefer the system of a blind nature to that of a wise intelligence? Do but ascend to first principles... and you will find that the infinite Being... is not an universal being, but a being vastly distinct from all others; that he has produced new substances as well as new forms; that he knows himself and all his productions;... that he may exist everywhere without extension of parts, as he knows every thing without succession of thoughts; that infinite extension is not his immensity, as infinite time is not his eternity; that space is only the manner in which bodies exist in him, as time is only the manner in which created beings exist with him; and lastly, that variable and finite beings are not different forms of his substance, but free effects of his power"(170).

Pythagoras: Truth is a "light" which "strikes with equal force upon all minds, ... and it can therefore be nothing else but a ray of that eternal Wisdom which enlightens all intelligences"(171).
Pythagoras taught "that besides the first principle, there were three sorts of intelligent beings, gods, heroes, and souls. He considered the first as the unalterable images of the sovereign mind, human souls as the least perfect of reasonable substances, and heroes as a sort of middle beings placed between the two others, in order to raise up souls to the divine union. Thus he represents to us the divine immensity, as containing innumerable worlds inhabited by spirits of different orders"(255).
Pythagoras "was of the opinion that man was composed of three parts, a pure spirit, an ethereal matter (which he called the subtle vehicle of the soul) and a mortal or gross body"(255). Old greek poets: the ethereal body (the representation, image or shadow) goes into the mortal body, assumes its shape (like molten metal), and keeps this "subtle vehicle" after death; the "second death" is the separation of the essence from the ethereal body (255-6). Pythagoras thought that pure spirit and subtle vehicle were inseparable, as did the Platonists(256).
Eleazar (Hebrew): God exists of himself and has no need for others, but "by a noble and free effort of his beneficent will, he has created divers orders of intelligences to make them happy. Man first forms the plan of his work before he executes it, but THE ETERNAL conceives, produces, and disposes every thing in order by the same act, without labour or succession... He wills, and instantly real beings, resembling those ideas, exist in his immensity; the whole universe, and the vast expanse of nature, distinct from divine essence, is produced. The Creator has represented himself two ways, by simple pictures, and by living images. Hence there are two sorts of creatures essentially different, material nature and intelligent nature; the one represents only some perfections of its original, the other knows and enjoys it; there are an infinite number of spheres full of such intelligent beings. Sometimes these spirits plunge themselves into the unfathomable depths of the divine nature to adore its beauties, which are ever new; at other times they admire the perfections of the Creator in his works; this is their two-fold happiness. They cannot incessantly contemplate the splendour of the divine essence; their weak and finite nature requires that they should sometimes veil their eyes; this is the reason why they material world was created, the refreshment of the intellectual"(Ramsay 219).
Eleazar: "Two sorts of spirits lost their happiness by their disloyalty; the one, called cherubim, were of a superior order, and are now infernal spirits; the other, called ischim, were of a less perfect nature; these are the souls which actually inhabit mortal bodies."(220). The head of the cherubim "approached nearer the throne that the other spirits"and lost its wisdom through pride. "The first were too much elated with pride, the second debased themselves by sensuality. Upon this there happened a great revolution in the heavens; the sphere of the cherubim became a dark chaos, where those unhappy intelligences deplore without consolation their lost felicity"(220). The ischim were "suffered to fall into a kind of lethargy or fatal insensibility" which ends only with entrance into a mortal body (220). "The organic moulds of all human bodies were shut up in that of Adam, and the order of generation was established; each soul awakens in such a body, and in such time, place, and circumstances, as suit best with the decrees of eternal wisdom"(220).
Messiah is the "head, and the conductor of all intelligent natures; he is the first-born of all creatures; the Deity united himself to him in an intimate manner from the beginning of time, and he has united himself to a portion of matter which serves him for a tabernacle; from this luminous centre incessantly stream rays that enlighten all the regions of imminiscence; this glorious body is the sun of the heavenly Jerusalem; the emanations of this adorable SHECHINAH are the life and light of all bodies, as those of his divinity are the reason and happiness of all intelligences"(221).

Intelligences=spirits (225)

Emmanuel not a subordinate god, but equal in glory to Jehova.-not a "Free production of the power of THE MOST HIGH, but a necessary emanation from his substance. All other beings, how exalted soever, whether angels or archangels, seraphim or cherubim, were drawn out of nothing, and may return to nothing again"(237-8).

Comment: This entry discusses Gnostic "intelligences" called aions and explains a theory of pre-mortal existence. It also gives the Gnostic idea of "matter," an opinion which influenced much of the Christian world and which Joseph Smith denied. In addition, it relates how the Gnostics felt they could restore "lost knowledge" about God's nature.

Excerpt (pages): "GNOSTICS": [First Century disciples of Simon Magus who were called Gnostics because they said they could] "restore mankind to the knowledge of the Supreme Being, which had been lost in the world" (96). [Adams states they grew in popularity in the time of Adrian and derived their philosophy from Eastern sources:] "The hypothesis of a soul distinct from the body, which had pre-existed in an angelic state, and was (for some offence committed in that state) degraded and confined to the body as a punishment, had been the great doctrine of the eastern sages from time immemorial"(96).
The Gnostics posited matter as the source of all evil. The eternal mind "from which all spirits derive their existense" must be perfect and beneficent; since matter is the only thing foreign to deity, it must be the source of evil. Matter is eternal, not created by the will of God but "from the creating power of some inferior intelligence, to whom the world and its inhabitants owed their existence."(96)

"In their system it was generally supposed, that all intelligences had only one source, viz. The Divine Mind. And to help out the doctrine concerning the origin of evil, it was imagined, that though the Divine Being himself was essentially and perfectly good, those intelligences, or spirits, who were derived from him, and especially those who were derived from them, were capable of depravation"(96).

"The great boast of the Gnostics, was their doctrine concerning the derivation of various intelligences (called aions) from the Supreme Mind, which they thought to be done by emanation or efflux: and as those were equally capable of producing other intelligences in the same manner, and some of them were male, and others female, there was room for endless combinations of them."(97).

The Gnostics connected Christ to a belief in an "extraordinary messenger" sent to enlighten men and "deliver them from the power of the malignant genii" who controlled the world and to "free their souls from the dominion of corrupt matter" (97). But Christ was neither divine (on par with the Father) or human (or else he would be evil).
Therefore, didn't really suffer on the cross because didn't really have a body. Some believed Jesus and Christ were two persons. Denominations included the Antitactae, Ascodrutes, Bardesanistes, Basilidians, Carpoercatians, Cerdonians, Ceriuthians, Marcosians, Ophites, Saturnians, Simonians, Valentinians.

Date of Publication: 1818

Nature of Source: A popular theological resource of 521 pages used extensively by theological dictionaries and encyclopedias which came after it (see Brown's Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (1836), for example). The dictionary was first published in London in 1802; it went through 42 printings, the last one in Philadelphia in 1873. Reverend Buck lived from 1771 to 1815 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 82. 1970:136-138).

Comment: Buck's dictionary does not include an entry on "Intelligence" or "Intelligences." However, this entry indicates that the term was commonly used as a synonym for "spirit" and associated with the natures of God, angels, and human souls.

Title of Article: "Sermon I: Divine Glory Displayed in the System of Nature"

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Salem, Massachusetts

Publisher: Henry Whipple

Nature of Source: A collection of 39 sermons by Samuel Worcester, Senior Pastor of the Tabernacle Church (Congregationalist) in Salem, Massachusetts. The sermons were collected, prepared, and published by Henry Whipple after Worcester's death. Worcester was, according to the book's preface, best known for his position as Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but he gave many sermons before the public and had published some previous discourses which were "favourably received" (iii). Sermon I is based on Psalm 19:1: "The heavens declare the glory of God." Its premise is that nature (including all the worlds in the universe) exhibits the infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God and, like the scriptures (God's other language of revelation), should inspire gratitude, humility, and obedience.

Comment: This sermon is interesting because it equates "created intelligences" with embodied "men." In addition, Worcester asserts that God's purpose in creation was to exhibit his glory (i.e. his power, wisdom, and goodness). In the process of manifesting his goodness, his works should also make humans happy. Worcester also defines two types of glory: "intrinsick" and "declarative." God's physical works declare his intrinsic glory. Finally, this section makes reference to "unnumbered worlds," a phenomenon Worcester seems to take for granted, and one that was promoted by preachers of "natural theology."

Excerpt (pages): "The glory of God is the highest interest of the universe, and the devout celebration of it is the noblest employment of created intelligences. It is when they are engaged in this employment, that good men on earth are raised to a participation of the dignity and happiness of the holy inhabitants of heaven. It is in the various works of God, that his glory is seen; and it is for the manifestation of his glory, that all his various works are performed" (17).

"Glory is either intrinsick [sic], or declarative. The intrinsick or essential glory of God, consists in the adorable excellencies, attributes, or perfections of his nature. His declarative glory consists in the manifestations which he makes of his infinite attributes, or perfections, in his great and wonderful works. It is the intrinsick or essential glory of God, which the heavens declare. The stupendous works of nature declare, or show forth the adorable perfections of Jehovah, particularly, his infinite power, his infinite wisdom, and his infinite goodness" (18-19).

"For what purpose did the infinite Creator give existence to this majestick monument of his almighty power? For what purpose did he create the earth and the heavens, with all their unnumbered hosts? Was it not, evidently, that he might communicate happiness. . . ? What is the plain and unequivocal indication of all those marks of infinite wisdom, and of skilful [sic] contrivance, in the general dispositions, and in all the parts of surrounding nature? . . . Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the grandeur and beauty of the creation, so favourably adapted to elevate, to inspire with admiration, and to fill with the purest pleasure, the devout and contemplative mind? . . . Is there not a display of infinite goodness in the beautiful scenery of our globe, . . . adapted to various beneficial purposes, and abounding with productions, in endless variety, for the convenience, the support, and the happiness of its diversified inhabitants?"(24).

Nature of Source: A two-volume work first written in London in 1777. Priestley (L.L.D., F.R.S.) was a prolific writer, producing treatises on electricity, vision, history, grammar, political science, and church authority and discipline, among other works. Here, Priestley espouses a Christian materialism that claims the "the proper unity of God . . . and the proper humanity of Christ" (iii). This massive "history of ideas" chronicles metaphysical debates about matter and spirit beginning in Eastern and Western antiquity.

Comment: These passages all specifically refer to "intelligences," associating them with aeons, angels, and "the eldest sons of god." On page 232, human souls are identified as "finite intelligences." These passages also mention the origin, structural organization, and final fate of intelligences.

Excerpt (pages): "It is maintained . . . in the SEQUEL of this treatise, that [although] . . . the ancient philosophers did make [a distinction] between matter and spirit . . . it was by no means . . . [one which denied] their having any common property[,] but a distinction which made the Supreme Mind the author of all good, and matter the source of all evil, that all inferior intelligences are emanations from the Supreme Mind, or made out of its substance, and that matter was reduced to its present form not by the Supreme Mind itself, but by another intelligence, a peculiar emanation from it[. This philosophy] has been the real source of the greatest corruptions of true religion in all ages, many of which remain to this very day" (Intro iii).

"That a spirit is, strictly speaking, indivisible, which is essential to the modern idea of it, is absolutely incompatible with the notion that is known to have run through almost all the systems of the ancients, derived originally from the East, viz. that all human souls, and all finite intelligences, were originally portions of the great soul of the universe; and though detached from it for a time, are finally to be absorbed into it again; when the separate consciousness belonging at present to each of them will be for ever lost. How the idea of a spirit came to be refined into the very attenuated state in which we now find it, I shall endeavour to investigate. . . " (72-74).

"Indeed, it is evident, that if nothing but immaterial substances, or pure intelligences, had existed, the very idea of place, or space, could not have occurred to us." (76).

"According to Zoroaster, says Beausobre, (in his History of Manicheism) God, who 'is self-existent, before all ages, formed the world of pure and happy spirits, the same that the Valentinians called aeons, the intelligences of the Platonists, and the angels of the Jews and christians' (315). [According to the Oracles of Zoroaster, human souls] "are all produced from one fire" (233).

[quoting Beausobre: Pythagoras postulated divine emanations, and called "these first intelligences NUMBERS, being the same with the aeons of the Valentinians [a Gnostic sect], those spirits which are, as it were, the eldest sons of God" (322).

"It is remarkable, that we find the same difference of opinion among the Greeks [as among the Hindus], the Stoics maintaining that inferior intelligences are detached from the supreme mind itself, and are to be absorbed into it again; whereas other sects make the human soul to be a portion of the soul of the universe, a principle distinct from the supreme mind, or to be composed in part of the one, and in part of the other" (310).

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Rome, Italy
Publisher: Edizioni Di Storia E Letteratura
Date of Publication: 1983
Nature of Source: A Letture Di Pensiero E D'Arte. It examines Dante's "conception of the nature and role of secondary causes" (9) and aims to "situate as precisely as possible the Dantean conceptions under discussion in relation to the philosophical traditions and problems of the time"(10). Bemrose discusses historical philosophies of intelligences, angels, and polytheistic deities and examines how they relate to each other and to Dante's cosmology.
Comment: The excerpts below discuss changing conceptions of "intelligences" and address the origin, role, and nature of these beings. Intelligences are compared with, and sometimes defined as, Christian angels. When distinguished from "angels," "Intelligences" refers to the cosmological "movers" or "motor Intelligences" of Graeco-Arab philosophy.

Excerpt (pages): [Avicenna (11th century Islamic philosopher):] "Now Avicenna's system involves Intelligences and heavens, but also souls which animate these heavens. These are seen by him as a necessary and intermediate stage between the Intelligences and the corporeal heavens. Being wholly immaterial, the Intelligences could not directly influence matter. They are simply the objects of the desire of the souls, who are attracted to their pure intellectuality. The Intelligences are thus final causes, just as in Aristotle. The souls, however, act as efficient causes upon the heavens, imparting to them circular motion, which is the manifestation appropriate to them of the desire to emulate as closely as possible the perfection of the Intelligences. In common with all Aristotelian thinkers, Avicenna holds that the matter of the heavens is fully actualised by its forms (which for him are the souls)"(29). "[Avicenna] also identifies the Intelligences (and the celestial souls) with the angels of revealed religion" (29). [As did Alfarabi, an Islamic philosopher who died in 950 A.D. (29, ft. 18).]
"The thirteenth-century Christian West... would... have at its disposal the elaborations of Averroes and the very different neo-Platonised systems of Alfarabi, Avicenna, and Algazel, in which what have become moved movers are ontologically linked in a hierarchical emanation-series and, moreover, are identified with the angels of religious tradition"(31).
[Not much talk about angels and cosmology until the 6th century, when Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite] "elaborates a hierarchically arranged system of Intelligences, which he identifies with the Christian angels. That there were a number of distinct types, or orders, of angels, had been accepted by earlier Patristic writers on scriptural grounds"(34). "The angelic Intelligences do not possess an intellect that is fragmented, or dependent on sensation; nor do they use discursive reasoning or subsume knowledge under universal concepts. Rather, they grasp divine intelligibles in a way that is intellectual, immaterial, and unitive"(35-36). [Their function is to] "illuminate each other hierarchically, and they also carry out an illuminative ministry in the world of men"(36). "Both [Intelligences and angels] are thought to be celestial beings in some way intermediate between the First Cause and the sublunary world. Both are immortal, though the Christian angels, the object of an act of creation in time, differ from the Intelligences in not being eternal. Both are in the final analysis spiritual"(37).

"[I]n the Questions on the Metaphysics, [Roger] Bacon deals with the nature of the Intelligences. Only the First Cause is absolutely separate from matter; the Intelligences, though incorporeal, possess a spiritual matter. Moreover, the Intelligences move voluntarily. . . . But, unlike the First Cause, their action is not identical with their will; rather, they have been delegated to carry out this movement instead of that, although their wills remain essentially free and in themselves indifferent to any particular movement. As is made clear in several other passages in his works, Bacon is in no doubt that Intelligences are to be equated with the Christian angels" (42). Bacon conceives of "conjoined movers" as souls, but is "anxious to contrast them with the souls of men (whereas Avicenna and Algazel were not)"(43).

Thomas Aquinas: intelligences/angels are efficient causes/immediate movers of the heavens, but are not substantial forms (souls) of the heavens (44). "Aquinas's readiness to accept the Intelligences by equating them with angels was shared by a good many Dominican thinkers contemporary with and after him"(45).

Dissent in the 13th century: "The refusal to accept angelic motor Intelligences could be primarily theological (in that it stemmed from a concern to avoid animate heavens, or more generally, to avoid the polytheistic tendencies arguably inherent in a doctrine of plural movers), or it could result from a challenge to Aristotelian physics itself"(47).

"In the Dantean cosmos, as we have seen, angelic Intelligences exercise a vital and fundamental role; they move the celestial spheres and, by means of the light radiated from those spheres, they endow what would be otherwise inert, amorphous matter with the countless forms of sublunary existence, both animate and inanimate. All that man finds about him on earth owes its particular form of discrete being to the angels. Even though the rational soul of man is directly infused by God without any intermediary, all those human dispositions and tendencies that were in general regarded as 'temperament' result from astral influence"(117).
Nature of Source: Blain is a destructionist from Buffalo, New York, who opposes both Universalism and endless misery for the wicked: "I believe the finally impenitent will lose existence, be literally destroyed at the final judgment" (2). This 16 page pamphlet was included on a microfilm collection of the works of Early Adventist, or Post-Millerite, groups from 1844-1870. See Ronald L. Numbers and Jonathan M. Butler, eds, The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987).

Comment: Discusses the meanings of the Hebrew olam and the Greek aion and their translations in the Bible. Though the primary English translation is "forever" or "everlasting," Blain uses theological scholarship to demonstrate places where a different English translation is used. Blain then asserts that "forever" and "everlasting" in the Bible often refer to a limited period of time and cannot be used to prove the endless misery of the damned.

The pamphlet is interesting because it defines aion, a word used by some Gnostic sects (esp. the Basilidians) to refer to "intelligences" or intelligent spiritual beings. In addition, it highlights the problems inherent in Biblical translation and suggests alternate readings for passages that imply plural worlds and/or speak to the nature of God, the timeline of creation, and the nature of future life or ages. It is interesting to replace some of these alternate English translations with the word "eternal" or "everlasting" and consider how the altered text fits into LDS theology and thought.

Excerpt (pages): "(1.) In the Hebrew, olam is the word from which forever and everlasting are translated. (2.) In the Greek of the New Testament, aion, and its adjective aionios, are the words thus translated. (3.) The words eternal and everlasting are translated from the same word, aionios, and so mean the same; and both mean the same as to time, as forever. . . . "(1)

"Prof. Stuart, in his critical work on these terms, says, on p. 15, 'the classical sense of aion (forever) is (1) length or space of time; and so time of life, age of man, age considered as a space of time. (2.) Long time, eternity, long indefinite space of time. These are the usual significations given by lexicographers.' . . . On p. 24 he says, 'The Bible meaning of aion (forever) in many passages is, (1) an indefinite or long period in time past. (2.) Age, in the sense of dispensation, as Jewish and Christian age. (3.) It has the meaning of world, as the present and future world.' . . . On the word olam (forever), [Parkhurst] says, 'It seems to be much more frequently used for an indefinite than for infinite time.' And in his Greek Lexicon, on the words aion and aionios, he says, 'The Hebrew word olam answers as the corresponding word for these two words in Greek, which words denote time hidden from man, whether indefinite or definite, whether past or future.' Prof. C. F. Husdon says, 'All the terms for eternity are very often in the Bible used in a modified sense' (2-3).

"We will next notice the singular fact that the Hebrew word olam, translated 'forever,' is often translated by words which do not mean endless.

1st. It is six times rendered 'ancient'... [Isaiah 44:7; Proverbs 22:28, Jer. 18:15, 5:15; Exo. 36:2; Psalms 77:5]

2nd. It is put 'continuance' in Isa. 4:5.

3rd. Olam is translated 25 times old and of old. [Deut. 32:7; Isa. 63:9, 11, 58:12; Jer. 6:16; Lam. 3:6; Job 22:15; Amos 9:11; Micah 7:14; Mal. 3:4; Prov. 23:10; Isa. 61:4; Ez. 25:25; Jer. 28:8; 2:20; Gen. 6:4; Lam. 27:8; Psa. 119:52; 25:6; Isa. 4:9; 57:11; 51:9; 61:4; Ez. 26:20; Josh. 24:25; Ecc. 1:10]

4th. Olam is translated four times long. [Psa. 143:4; Ecc. 12:5; Lev. 25:32; Isa. 42:14]

5th. Olam is put three times world. Isaiah 64:4-'since the beginning of the world.' We should keep in mind how it would seem for us to say, since the beginning of everlasting, or forever, or eternity! [Psa. 72:2; Ecc. 3:11]. . .

"Again: Olam is rendered five times alway and always. Gen 6:3-'My Spirit shall not always strive with man,' so life was limited to 120 years. 1 Chron. 16:15. Job 7:16. Psa. 119:112. Jer. 20:17.

"Olam being thus translated by these various terms, it is evident that it conveys the ideas of permanence, enduring, and an indefinite long period of time, as well as that of eternity; . . .

"I conclude this tedious research by quoting and referring to 40 passages where these terms [aion and aionios] are translated world and ages instead of forever and everlasting, as in other texts. There has been much dispute among the learned as to the meaning of world as thus translated: one party claiming that it means age and ages; as Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian ages; the other side says, 'it means the entire present state of existence, in distinction from the future, which is to follow the resurrection of the dead.' . . ." (6-7).

"1 Cor. 8:13-'If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world (aion) standeth.' Heb. 1:2-'by whom also he made the worlds.' 11:13-'Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God.' Here the plural of aion is used, and rendered worlds. McNight says, 'it is literally ages.'

"Eph. 2:7-'that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace,' Col. 1:26-even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations.' In these two texts the same Greek phrases are put ages, which in Heb. 1:2 and 11:3 (as above) are put worlds. We see the sense requires the word ages.

shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?' Wakefield and McNight translate it 'end of the age.'

"Matt. 13:16, 42-'the field is the world (kosmas,) the harvest is the end of the world (aion); verse 40-'so shall it be in the end of this world (aion).' Notice the difference-'the field is the kosmos,' which is the proper Greek word for the material world; and is used 188 times in the New Testament. Why is it used once in this parable, and aion twice? The answer is, this natural world is not to be ended, but made a new earth; so we see here aion means age of dispensation, but may mean the present state of existence.

"In Heb. 9:26, a like passage occurs-'then must he often suffered since the foundation of the world (kosmos), but now in the end of the world (aion) hath he appeared to put away sin.' Matt 13:49; 28:20-'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.' Eternity has no end. 1 Cor. 10:11

"The following texts tell of this world and the world to come by aion. 2 Cor. 4:4-'the god of this world hath blinded,' etc. Eph. 6:12. Gal. 1:4-'delivered us from this present evil world.' Rom. 12:2. Luke 6:8. 2 Tim. 4:11. 1 Cor. 3:18. 1 Tim. 6:17... Tit. 2:12. Matt 13:22-'the cares of this world choke the world.' Mark 4:19. 1 Cor. 1:20; 2:6, 8-'not the wisdom of this world.' Heb. 6:5-'tasted the powers of the world to come.' Mark 10:30. Luke 18:20-'and in the world to come eternal life.' Wakefield's rendering is 'in the age that is coming, eternal life.' Luke 20:34, 46-'The children of this world marry' etc."(7-8).

"With these Bible-proved facts before us, we can see Taylor is right when, in his Hebrew Concordance, he says, 'olam (the same as aion, forever,) signifies eternity, not from the proper force of the word, but, when the sense of the place, or the nature of the subject to which it is applied, requires it; as God and his attributes'"(9).

Excerpt (pages): "KEYS, power of the, a term made use of, in reference to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, denoting the power of excommunicating and absolving. The Romanists say that the pope has the power of the keys, and can open and shut paradise as he pleases; grounding their opinion on that expression of Jesus Christ to Peter-'I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' Matt. Xvi.19. But every one must see that this is an absolute perversion of Scripture, for the keys of the kingdom of heaven, most notably, refer to the Gospel dispensation, and denote the power and authority of every faithful minister to preach the Gospel, administer the sacraments, and exercise government, that men may be admitted to, or excluded from the church, as is proper. See ABSOLUTION.

"In St. Gregory we read that it was the custom for the popes to send a golden key to princes, wherein they inclosed a little of the filings of St. Peter's chain, kept with such devotion at Rome; and that these keys were worn in the bosom, as being supposed to contain some wonderful virtues! Such has been the superstition of past ages!!"(246).

Comment: Beecher maintains that those without the law of God will still be culpable for their actions because they still possess universal "intuitive principles of honor and right" (26). He makes this argument to bolster his claim that God must also operate by principles of honor and right and would not therefore condemn every human for sins that Adam committed. Cf. D&C 29:46-50.

Excerpt (pages): "I refer to the final judgment of all who have lived and died without a written revelation of the laws of God. That such will be judged and punished for their sins, is distinctly announced by the Apostle Paul (Rom. 2:12, 16). The reason which justifies this mode of proceeding is there distinctly declared to be, that God has so constituted their minds that their intuitive decisions on questions of honor and right are, in fact, a law of God, although not revealed by a written revelation" (21).

"Dr. Chalmers says of the apostle's reasoning, in verse 15, 'There seem here to be two distinct proofs of the Gentiles being a law unto themselves. The first is from the fact of there being a conscience individually at work in each bosom, and deponing either to the merit or demerit of actions; the second, from the fact of their accusing or excusing one another in the reasonings or disputes which took place between man and man. * * * This proves them to be in possession of a common rule of standard of judging; or, in other words, that a law is actually among them. So true it is, even in its application to the Gentiles, that there is a light which lighteth every man who cometh into the world.' Again, 'There do exist, even in the remotest tracks of paganism, such vestiges of light, as, when collected together, form a code or directory of moral conduct. There are still to be found among them the fragments of a law, which they never follow but with an approving conscience. . ." (23).

of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but he gave many sermons before the public and had published some previous discourses which were "favourably received" (iii). Sermon I is based on Psalm 19:1: "The heavens declare the glory of God." Its premise is that nature (including all the worlds in the universe) exhibits the infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God and, like the scriptures (God's other language of revelation), should inspire gratitude, humility, and obedience.

Comment: The last section of this sermon develops the statement, "The language of nature is in perfect consonance with the language of revelation." Worcester asserts that nature "proclaims, from day to day, the infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of its divine Author, his universal dominion, and the absolute dependence of all beings and things upon him" (28). He then states that inspired revelation reiterates this message, although it also adds information about sin, repentance, and redemption. This passage is interesting because it posits a universal "lesser" or "basic" truth and knowledge accessible to all. In addition, it suggests that those with more knowledge will be judged more harshly than those with less. Cf. Alma 9:23; Doctrine and Covenants 82:3; 84:46; 88:7.

Author: Elias Smith
Title of Book:
Title of Article: "Introduction"
Title of Periodical: The Morning Star and City Watchman
Place of Publication: Boston, Massachusetts
Publisher: E. Bellamy
Date of Publication: June 3, 1827 (Vol. 1:1)
Nature of Source: Periodical published monthly by Elias Smith, an Elder in the Christian Church and "Minister of the New Testament," who was born June 17, 1769." Smith started the first "religious newspaper" in the United States, The Herald of Gospel Liberty, in 1809. He established The Morning Star and City Watchman to "give the best and most correct knowledge of the things of God and Christ"(6) and to "expose error, to give the truth in its original simplicity,—to distinguish between the righteous and the wicked, between the doctrines and commands of men, and... of Christ; and to keep back nothing profitable as to doctrine, reproof, instruction in righteousness..." (24).

Comment: In a paragraph explaining the title of his periodical, Smith discusses the use of the word "stars" as "similitudes to illustrate different subjects" in the Scriptures (5). In particular, he points to Christ as the "day" or "morning star" (see Numbers 24:17, 27; Luke 1:78; 2 Peter 1:19; Revelations 3:28, 22:16). When, in Numbers 24:17, Christ is connected with both a star and a sceptre, Smith writes that "the star means an instructor, or one who proclaims light, and gives light, and a sceptre to shew that that the instructor is also the ruler" (6). However, Smith also connects stars to ministers of Christ (Daniel 12:3) and to false teachers (Jude 1:13).

Most interesting, however, is his interpretation that "Lucifer" referred to in Isaiah 14:12 is really Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. It appears that for Smith, "Stars" are used entirely in a symbolic sense: he makes no literal connection between real astronomical bodies and divinity. In addition, he interprets the fall of Lucifer as an event that took place in mortality, not in a pre-mortal existence or council.

king of Babylon. At that time he was considered the light of the morning, to whom all nations looked for deliverance" (5).

the nature and role of secondary causes" (9)-i.e., Intelligences or angels—and aims to "situate as precisely as possible the Dantean conceptions under discussion in relation to the philosophical traditions and problems of the time"(10). Bemrose discusses historical philosophies of intelligences, angels, and polytheistic deities and examines how they relate to each other and to Dante's cosmology.
Comment: This excerpt discusses the Liber de intelligentiis—a book written in 1230 A.D. by an anonymous author—and similar medieval philosophies which proposed a relationship between light, matter, intelligences, and God's substance.

Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist
Date of entry: July 16, 1999

Excerpt (pages): The Liber de intelligentiis is "an extreme example of the so-called Light-metaphysic, which had considerable support at that time [the thirteenth century]. Most of its proponents, such as Grosseteste, went no further than to assert that light was the most perfect of corporeal forms. Yet because it was a corporeal form, it could not exist apart from matter. Indeed, they held that the corporeity of Prime Matter was light. The liber de intelligentiis is much more audacious; its author believes light to be a separated form, and, moreover, that the Intelligences are lights and that God is pure light" (38-39).

Title of Book: "Who Was Melchizedek?"

Title of Periodical: The Morning Star and City Watchman

Place of Publication: Boston, Massachusetts

Publisher: E. Bellamy

Date of Publication: Sept. 1827 (Vol 1:4).

Nature of Source: Periodical published monthly by Elias Smith, a Christian minister born in 1769. Smith started the first "religious newspaper" in the United States, The Herald of Gospel Liberty, in 1809. He established The Morning Star and City Watchman to "give the best and most correct knowledge of the things of God and Christ" and to "expose error, to give the truth in its original simplicity,-to distinguish between. . . the doctrines and commands of men, and the doctrine and commands of Christ; and to keep back nothing profitable as to doctrine, reproof, instruction in righteousness. . . " (24).

Comment: This sermon give insight into popular nineteenth-century conceptions of Melchizedek, contains comparisons between Christ and Melchizedek, and speaks of "limited" versus "unlimited" priesthood and of a non-lineal priesthood bestowed by God. It implies that "blessing" and "tithing" are metaphorical in contemporary times and that if one were to "give" the priesthood to another, the giver would be left priesthood-less (using this logic, if Christ were to have given his priesthood to Peter, Christ would have been left without priesthood.)

Date of entry: June 17, 1999

Excerpt (pages): "He was a man, who lived in Salem, now called Jerusalem."
"According to Paul's explanation, the word Melchizedek signifies righteousness, and the world Salem means peace, He says, Heb. vii. 2. . . .

"Christ is said to be a priest after the order of Melchizedek, who was a righteous, peaceable king; and at the same time while he ruled on the throne, he was a priest of the most high God, to offer sacrifices, and pray for the people. There is no other man mentioned in the scriptures, who was a king and priest at the same time.

"It is thought by many that Melchizedek was not a man. It is as certain that he was a man, as it is certain that Aaron was a man. The account of him in Genesis xiv is proof of it. He is there called king of Salem, which place is now called Jerusalem. He set forth bread and wine before Abraham. . . . Abraham gave him a tenth part of all the spoil he had taken from the kings he overcame. This proves him a man. He was priest of the most high God on earth. Paul says of Christ, Heb. viii. 4. 'For if he were on earth; he could not be a priest.' There is no place in the scripture, which mentions Christ as a priest on earth. He, as a priest, is passed into the heavens. Melchizedek being a priest on earth, proves him a man. Paul calls him a great man.; Heb. vii.4 'Now consider how great this man was.'

"There are several things mentioned in Hebrews, which lead many people to conclude Melchizedek was not a man. It is said, chap. vii. ver. 3, that he was without father, without mother, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually. This is easily reconciled. Paul is not speaking of Melchizedek as a man, but as a priest. As a man he had a father, mother, descent, beginning of days, and end of life. The priests under the law all descended from Aaron, who was a priest: If they could not prove that their father and mother were both of the tribe of Levi, they had no right to the priesthood. Melchizedek had no father who was a priest before him. His being without descent, means, that he did not descend from priests, or from the tribe of Levi.-Paul say, ver. 6, 'But he, whose descent is not counted from them, received tithes from Abraham.' . . . It is said he was without beginning of days, or end of life. The meaning of this is, that there was no particular time in his life, when he should enter into his priestly office, or go out of it. The priests under the law entered into their office at a certain age, and went out at a certain age. This was a limited priesthood. Melchizedek had an unlimited priesthood, which pointed to Christ, whose priesthood is unlimited and unchangeable. Christ is said to be after the order, and after the similitude of Melchizedek; but if Melchizedek means Christ, then he is a priest after the order or similitude of himself. This would be nonsense.

"I here mention a few particulars in which Christ is a priest after the order of Melchizedek. 1. Melchizedek was a king of righteousness, and king of peace. So is Christ. Isa. xxiii.2. . . . 2. Melchizedek was king and priest. So is Christ a king upon his throne, and a great high priest on the right hand of God.

"3. Melchizedek had no relation before him, nor any after him that were priests. He did not receive his priesthood from man, nor leave it to any man. It began and continued with him: so it is with Christ. 'For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judea, of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.' God gave him his priestly office, and it remains with him: 'But this man, because he continueth forever, hath an unchangeable priesthood.' Though the bishop of Rome pretends that Christ gave his priesthood to Peter, yet he has not: he remains a priest forever, after the order of Melchizedek.
"4. Melchizedek was a great man, and a great priest; greater than Abraham whom he blest. Paul says, Heb. vii.5, 'Now consider how great this man was.' So Christ the high priest is great: he is greater than Moses, greater than . . . the angels. . . Paul calls him a 'Great High Priest.'

"5. Melchizedek set bread and wine before Abraham when he was returning from the slaughter: so Christ the high priest does. He set bread and wine before his disciples with his own hands, the night in which he was betrayed, and now in that ordinance he does it by his ministers, to all who eat the bread and drink the wine discerning the Lord's body.

"6. Melchizedek blessed Abraham. So does Christ. God sent him to bless us: 'blessed are all they that put their trust in him.'

"7. Melchizedek received tithes of Abraham. This showed that Abraham belonged to his kingdom. Christ receives a tribute of praise from all who submit to him, and their giving to him the glory due to his name, shows that they are entitled to his protection" (78-81).

Date of Publication: 1795
Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phoenicia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Diodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308).
An edition was published in London in1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, expressed the virtues and the passions of the soul, the action and attributes of the gods, by the figures of animals, insects, plants, stars, and divers other symbolical characters.

Hence it is that we see sphynxes, serpents, birds and crocodiles in our ancient temples, and upon our obelisks; but they are not the objects of our worship, as the Greeks foolishly imagine. Trismegistus concealed the mysteries of religion under hieroglyphics and allegories, and exposed nothing to the eyes of the vulgar, but the beauties of his morality. This has been the method of the sages in all times, and of the great legislators in all countries. These divine men were sensible that corrupted minds could have no relish for heavenly truth till the heart was purified from its passions; for which reason they spread over religion a secret veil, which opens and vanishes when the eyes of the understanding are able to support its brightness"(100).

Cyrus in the temple of Jupiter Olympus at Crete: "As he had learnt the Greek mythology, he could easily distinguish all the divinities, and discern the mysteries couched in the allegorical figures that were before him. What drew his attention more especially, was to see that each of the celestial dieties held in his hand a golden tablet: upon these tablets were written the exalted ideas of Minos in religion, and the several answers which the oracle had given that lawgiver, when he consulted them about the nature of the gods, and the worship they required"(150-151).

Pythagoras: "I have travelled among all the different nations of the universe to learn wisdom, which is only to be found in the traditions of the ancients"(155).

Daniel to Cyrus: "Religion is not a system of philosophical opinions, nor yet a history of miracles, or supernatural events, but a science that dilates the heart, and fills it with godlike sentiments, a science which God reveals only to pure minds; to know the secrets of religion, to feel its energy, a superior power to man must descend into you, become absolute master of you, and ravish you from yourself."(239).

"secret knowledge kept under a veil"(248).

Comment: Ramsay alludes to a plurality of worlds many times throughout this novel when he has his characters recite Graeco-Arab mythologies. The excerpt below is a comment in his own voice from his "Discourse."

Date of Publication: 1795
Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phoenicia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Dirodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308).

Comment: In these passages from Book 7, Cyrus is told the mythology of those in Tyre (Phonecia). The mythology-as presented in fictional form by Ramsay-is interesting because it 1) describes the son of the supreme deity creating "numberless worlds"; 2) describes a human being as being composed of a physical body, a spiritual "body" ("subtle vehicle") and a pure spirit; and 3) suggests different "purification" stages in the earth, moon and the stars preparatory to entering God's presence "in a sublime place above the heavens" by becoming one with his image. In this passage, the term "second death" seems to mean a loss of spiritual distinctiveness and is viewed as a positive event. Congruent with Ramsay's purpose in writing The Travels of Cyrus, the passage also includes allusions to a Christ figure who redeems mankind from its fall.

Excerpt (pages): Belus had a son, Adonis, "whom he had engendered like unto himself"(192). "Adonis, animated by the power of Belus, moulded some rays of light, and made suns, stars, and numberless worlds invisible to us; but as yet there were no inhabitants for them"(192). A beautiful flower, containing the soul of the world, sprang from the Abyss. Adonis breathed on it and created a goddess "not yet able to support the splendour of the divine presence, or to breathe the pure air of the empyreum"(192). Her name was Urania and, conceiving with a mere look of Adonis, "she quickly peopled the stars with gods and goddesses, who had no other law than that of obeying the will of Adonis, loving each other tenderly as the children of the same father, and aspiring by their virtue to become one day worthy of seeing the god Belus"(193). But Urania became too curious, was dissatisfied with her state, and was thrown to the realm of the Sun. She drew after her the inhabitants of seven other stars-these became the planets. Urania lived on the moon where "she now enjoyed only a borrowed light, was clothed with an aerial and transparent body, which the Greeks call the subtle vehicle of the soul"(194). She later fell again (to the earth, as Venus); she took some of the demi-gods with her, where they lived as men in the golden ages and "still preserved some marks of their original nature"(195).

Eventually, after counseling with Belus, Adonis left Venus alone on earth. He told her, "You can see me no more till you be transformed into my image; the gods are only enamoured with their own beauty. You must suffer a thousand miseries before this happy metamorphosis, nor can you reascend to heaven, but by the same way by which you fell from it; you must first be stripped of your terrestrial body by sufferings, diseases and death; you shall then rise to the regions of the moon, where you will undergo a second death, by the destruction of your aerial body; your pure spirit, free and disengaged from every thing that could stop it, will fly away to the stars, where you will resume your former beauty; but you must at length lose even that, before you are transformed into my image. When you have undergone these three metamorphoses, expiated your guilt, by the purifying pains of each new transformation, practised upon earth, in the moon, and in the stars, all the human heroic and divine virtues, you shall ascend with me into the sublime place above the heavens, where you shall see the god Belus, and the goddess my mother; virtue, truth, and justice, not as they are here below, but as they exist in him who is being itself"(198-199). Pluto (in the underworld) would purify souls of sin so they would be prepared to behold the Father, then Adonis would banish evil and reestablish harmony.

Title of Book: A Review, Giving the Main Ideas in Dr. Edward Beecher's Conflict of Ages: And a Reply to Them, and Also to the Views of His Reviewers.

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: n.p

Publisher: n.p

Date of Publication: 1853? This review was also appended to the 1859 Boston edition of Blain's Death not Life

Nature of Source: Blain is a destructionist: opposed to Universalism because he believes that not everyone will be saved, but also opposed to doctrines of endless misery, since he believes in the final annihilation of the unrepentant. This 36-page review was included in a microfilm collection of the works of Early Adventist, or Post-Millerite, groups from 1844-1870. See Ronald L. Numbers and Jonathan M. Butler, eds, The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987).

Blain reviews Conflict of Ages, a book by Edward Beecher (son of Dr. Lyman Beecher and brother of Henry Ward Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe) that was in its fifth edition only three months after it was published (2).

Comment: Blain addresses Beecher's thesis that seeming injustices of this life can be explained by positing a Fall in a pre-existent state. Blain disagrees with this final hypothesis, stating that evil does not compromise God's justice as long as evil itself is finite. These excerpts summarize Beecher's theory (in the words of Blain).

Date of entry: July 2, 1999

Excerpt (pages): "He says, there must be a re-adjustment,' of our system of divinity, and to effect it, has recourse to a pre-existent state and fall—that is that our souls (taking for granted that we have souls which can exist separate from our bodies) were created and existed somewhere, and in some period in eternity past—were put on probation, and each soul, for itself, had a fair trial, and fell, each soul for itself—that the penalty for failure in that probation, was endless life in misery.

"God, then, in his sovereignty, devised the present material system, and making our material bodies, brings these fallen and polluted souls into them, at some time between conception and birth; entirely forgetting they ever existed before. In this way he [Beecher] accounts for the universal depravity of our race—this is the cause of 'going astray as soon as born.' Properly, we are old offenders, or old devils, when born.

"The design of this system, and new probation, is to redeem a church out of the race, for his glory and the good of the universe. All not redeemed, are to be doomed to eternal woe, as the reward of their fall and sins, in that former state. On p. 368 he says, 'Christ came to redeem a church, to destroy the kingdom and works of Satan, and to reorganize the universe of God. All of our race not included in this redemption, are to perish forever.' (This, one would think, is annihilation)" (8-9).

Beecher argues for the necessity of the doctrine, and argues that the Bible does not oppose it. Blain says Beecher errs in attributing an infinite punishment for finite sin (16).

Author: Samuel Parker
Title of Book: An Account of the Nature and Extent of the Divine Dominion and Goodnesse especially as they refer to the Origenian Hypothesis concerning the Preexistence of Souls together with a special Account of the vanity and groundlesnes of the Hypothesis it self. Being a second Letter Written to his Honoured Friend and Kinsman Mr. Nath. Bisbie.
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Oxford
Publisher: W. Hall for R. Davis
Date of Publication: 1666.
Nature of Source: Parker (1640-1688) is an Anglican, an M.C.T and a Fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote from both Trinity College and Cambridge. In 1686 he was made bishop of Oxford. "He criticised Plato, Aristotle, Descartes, and Hobbes; attacked the puritans, and wrote on ecclesiastical history and political science"(Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee, eds., The Dictionary of National Biography, Volume XV. London: Oxford University Press, 1959-60: 272-275, at 272). This letter was included in a collection of five essays, including a 1662 letter about "the new Sect of Lattitude Men" and a 1666 treatise called A free and Impartial Censure of the Platonick Philosophie, both by Parker. The volume also includes work by other authors, including a 1723 dissertation about the "fall of man and the Coming of Christ," a 1608 discussion of predestination, and a 1726 rebuttal of "unconditional election and reprobation," by Edward Bird.

Comment: Parker here sets out several arguments in favor of pre-existence (including an unusual one attributed to Porphyry) in order to refute them. He provides a concise summary of the Origenian theory of pre-existence, which argues for a premortal state in order to defend the goodness of God.

Researcher: Danille Christensen Lindquist

Date of entry: July 10, 1999

Excerpt (pages): Thoughts of the theory of pre-existence's "most Peremptory assertours":

"That the Souls of men are not then first produced, when they are united to the Bodies prepared for them by generation, but were created all at first in an incomparably more Blessed and Divine Condition of Life, then that they are now condemned to in this sad Region of sin and misery, but that at several times and occasions by their Revolt from God & his righteous laws they forfeited their better life and condition, and so were thrust down into these terrestial [sic] Bodies, partly to be punished for their former prevarications, and partly that by acting their parts well here, they might recover that more happy state from which they lapsed into this. And this they endeavour to prove, "1. from the nature of Divine Goodness, which, (say they) is constrained alwaies to do what is best; for the Souls of men being capable of eternall existence and happiness backward as well as forward, and it being much better that they should have enjoyed the pleasure of their life and actions from eternal Ages, then either to have layn so long in the comfortless night of nothing, or to have been first created in so mean and wretched a condition, as that is which they suffer in the Region of Death and Misery; and then God being infinitely good and gracious, and infinite Goodness doing by the same necessity that which is best, as infinite fire will necessarily burn whatever is combustible, if put to it, it clearly and unavoidably follows (say they) they must have existed of old before they came into these Bodies.

"2. From the Actions of Providence, which will not otherwise correspond to those holy Attributes in the Deity, Righteousness and Benignity, according to which he Governs and Orders the affairs of all the World. And this argument they make use of two waies, viz. In respect of the place and time wherein we are born, and of the temper and disposition of the body, wherewith we are born" (45-46).[I.e. Why would God send an innocent soul into the world, where it would be sure to fall? And why, if there "are in mankind strange & fatal propensities to all manner of vice & wickedness, that flow from the very instrinsick constitution of their Bodies," would God put an innocent soul into such a corrupt vehicle? (46-47.)] "And here some of them argue more particularly from the absurdity of the two opinions of the souls immediate creation, or seminal traduction; for if it begins neither of these waies, it must have pre-existed, therefore (1) against the first of them, they use the formentioned Argument, viz. That it seems inconsistent with the Goodness and Benignity of God, to put pure and immaculate spirits into such Bodys as will presently defile them, pervert all their powers and faculties, and incline them to all manner of vice and impiety. And then (2) against the second, viz. Seminal Propagation of souls, they argue from the nature of the soul it self, for (say they) if the soul be generated then it must be made of the soul of the Parent, which is against the nature of an immaterial Being, the cheif [sic] propertie of which is to be indiscerpable."(47-48).
Parker's objections: 1. The theory is beyond human speculation/knowledge and cannot be proven. 2. It is unfair to punish people for sins they committed ignorantly and have no memory of. "I conclude therefore that if the calamities of this life were inflicted upon us only as punishments of sins committed in another, Providence would have provided some effectual means to preserve them in our Memories; and therefore because we find no remainders of any such Records in our minds, 'tis (I think) sufficient evidence to all sober and impartial enquirers, that our living and sinning in a former state is as false as invident"(49). 3. People would be justified in questioning God's "Goodness and Equity": "In that it would be an invincible Temptation to mankind to have hard and jealous thoughts of Gods dealings with them" (50).

Parker: "...[T]he boundless infinity of the Divine Goodness is consistent with the existence of different Ranks and Orders of Creatures, God being not constrained to make every Creature the most Perfect he can, for then there would have been but one sort of Beings, viz. The highest and most consummate Rank of all, whereas we see the World replenish'd with divers species of Creatures, some more, some less perfect. ... Then what necessity or Reason imaginable is there, the Divine Goodness should be constrain'd to let forth its largest Emanations to mankind; for why may not our species be of an inferior Rank in the Order of Beings? And if so, then what necessity is there we should be endued with all possible Perfections? Are there not several Ranks of Spirits or Immaterial Beings? And are not the Assertors of Preexistence the most Zealous Patrons thereof? And do they not Marshal the Souls of Men in one of the lowest and most imperfect Orders, as being united to the grossest and most ignoble Body, viz. Terrestrial matter, whilst all the rest reside in Bodies of Aire or Aether? And therefore for men to deem the Divine Goodness less infinite, because its Communications are not so great to them as they are to others, is as absurd as it was for the Figs in the Fable, that complain'd to Jupiter, because he had not made them Grapes."(59-60).

Even if scriptures in John prove the pre-existence of Christ, "we may as well prove we were all born of Virgin-Mothers because he was"(109).

Other hypotheses:
Porphyry's explanation: "As a fruitful field, though it may for a certain period of years yield good Grain, yet at length it is exhausted and grows barren, and then if it be laid fallow though it brings forth nothing but weeds and tares, yet it thereby recovers its ancient vigour and fruitfulness; so our Souls having been for many ages impregnated with the seed of Divine Ideas, by degrees spent themselves in bringing forth large returns of contemplation, till at length their Intellectual powers decaying, the higher part falls into a swoon, and they can exert no acts but of Imagination, whence spring forth the powers of the Vegetal life, which cause in them strong and irresistible propensities to an union with these inferior and terrestrial Bodies, in order to the awaking of the higher Powers, for because every thing in the Etherial Regions is too calme and serene to awake them, they are therefore conveyed to this place of noises and disturbance, and invessel'd in a body full of rude and impetuous passions, by which they may be chased into life and sensation again"(52)

Topics: premortal existence, creation, plural worlds, three separate beings

Author: Joseph Priestley

Title of Book: A General View of the Arguments for the Unity of God; and Against the Divinity and Pre-Existence of Christ, from Reason;--From the Scriptures;--and from History.

Comment: The first excerpt raises-but dismisses-the premortal existence of human souls. Priestley asserts that in early times, beliefs of Christ as creator and pre-existent spirit went hand in hand; he refers to Gnostics who distinguished between Jesus, the mortal man, and Christ the pre-existent spirit; and he states that "pre-existence" was only an opinion among the learned. The excerpts below also mention the prevalence of the "plural worlds" theory, discuss some consequences of belief in a "derived" or separate God, and refer to arguments against creation ex nihilo.

Date of entry: June 21, 1999

Excerpt (pages): [In response to Arianism]: "If the world was created and governed by a derived being, this being, on whom we immediately depended, would be that to whom all men would naturally look. He would necessarily become the object of their prayers, in consequence of which the supreme being would be overlooked, and become a mere cypher in the universe.

"As modern philosophy supposes that there are innumerable worlds inhabited by rational and imperfect beings (for all creatures must be finite, and imperfect) besides this of ours, it cannot be supposed but that many of them must have stood in as much need of the interposition of the maker of the universe as we have done. And can we suppose either that this should be in the only spot in the universe so highly distinguished, or that the maker of it should undergo as many degradations as this scheme may require?

"The doctrine of Christ's pre-existence goes upon the idea of the possibility, at least, of the pre-existence of other men, and supposes an immaterial soul in man, altogether independent of the body; so that it must have been capable of thinking, and acting before his birth, as well as it will be after his death. But these are suppositions which no appearance in nature favours."(8-9).

"It is only of late years, that any persons have pretended to separate the two opinions of Christ's pre-existence, and of his being the maker of the world. All the antient Arians maintained both, as did Dr. Clarke, Mr. Whiston, Mr. Emlyn, Mr. Pierce and their followers"(15).

Two kinds of heresy in primitive church: "those who held that Christ was simply a man, and that of the Gnostics; of whom some believed that Christ was man only in appearance, and others that it was only Jesus and not the Christ (a pre-existent spirit who descended from heaven and dwelt in him) that suffered on the cross. Now the apostle John animadverts with the greatest severity upon the latter, but makes no mention of the former;"(16).

"11. Justin Martyr, who maintains the pre-existence of Christ, is so far from calling the contrary opinion a heresy that what he says on the subject is evidently an apology for his own; and when he speaks of heretics in general, which he does with great indignation, as no christians, and having no communication with christians, he mentions Gnostics only"(19).

"14. The first who held and discussed the doctrine of the pre-existence and divinity of Christ, acknowledged that their opinions were exceedingly unpopular among the unlearned christians; that these dreaded the doctrine of the trinity, thinking that it infringed upon the doctrine of the supremacy of God the Father; and the learned christians make frequent apologies to them, and to others, for their own opinion"(19-20).

"As to the Arian hypothesis in particular, I do not know that it can be traced any higher than Arius himself, or at least the age in which he lived. Both the Gnostics and the platonizing Christians, were equally far from supposing that Christ was a being created out of nothing; the former having thought him to be an emanation from the supreme being, and the latter the logos of the Father personified. And though they sometimes applied the term creation to this personification, still they did not suppose it to have been a creation out of nothing. It was only a new modification of what existed before. For God, they said, was always. . ., or had within him that principle which afterwards assumed a personal character"(23-24).

Author: Andréa Pizzani
Title of Book: Pre-existence and Future Existence, or The Soul Created in the Image of God, Changed in Form but not in Identity. Free Translation and Abridgement. From Andréa Pizzani.
Title of Article:
A treatise intending to disprove the idea of eternal punishment or reward and to prove the existence of "final restoration and progression," a project that will, according to the author, "substitute hope, faith, and charity and a reasonable belief for vague speculation; mercy for cruelty, and the benevolence of God for the selfishness of man" (iv). Pizzani's focus is on future lives and progression-pre-existence is mentioned only as a link in continuity, and it seems to have taken place upon this earth. Pizzani suggests that Elias and Enoch may have been reincarnated.

Pizzani's references to eclectic sources suggest that he is a "hermetic" writer by John Brooke's definition (Refiner's Fire). Though Brooke asserts that Hermeticism influenced the LDS concept of pre-existence, the following passages show little resemblance to the teachings of Joseph Smith.

Numerous writers of various nations, and of varying opinions (some it may be admitted fanciful and some clearly erroneous), have all either hinted or asserted their belief in a plurality of existences" (iii).

Pre-existence, and successive lives.
General advance and improvement of the universe under the providential direction of the Creator"(9).

"The notion of Metempsychosis (which from its antiquity and great influence may be called a dogma) took its rise in India, but its origin is unknown.

"After passing from India into Persia and Egypt, it was taught by many Greek Philosophers, and it may also be discovered later, in the Roman Catholic doctrine of Purgatory.

"The Vedas have many striking passages, mixed with absurdities about the passage of the human soul into the bodies of beasts;--they also entertain the idea than an animal may receive a renewal of life; and that as we quit old garments for better, so the soul lays down worn out bodies, in exchange for new ones.-After many rehabilitations, good and wise and holy beings go back to Brama, no longer to return to this evil world.

"The writings of Zororaster maintain that in the last days, all resistance being conquered, the will of God will be done on earth as in heaven, and in hell-in fact that hell will be hell no longer—the regenerated earth will be as heaven, and the Divine Kingdom will extend over the Universe"(9-10).

"The views or Plato as well as those of his illustrious master Socrates, are founded upon a transmigration of souls, and upon their pre-existence."(11)

"But there is surely nothing adverse to the truths of Christianity, in the idea of a pre-existence, any more than in that of a plurality of existences?"

"When it pleased the Messiah to become visible by taking to himself the form of man, he did not see fit to explain the whole plan of creation. He plainly taught the grand truth of a resurrection, but he neither affirmed or denied the system of a plurality of existences.

"Learned modern writers have declared that progress is the law of creation. This truth was divined by many of the ancient philosophers, and by some of the Christian fathers, among others by St. Augustine.

"Sir John Herschel, in his discourse upon Natural History, hints at a succession of life. It cannot be supposed that man is the last link of the chain which unites the creature to the Creator. As the earth which he rules acts upon other globes of the universe, upon the condition of being itself affected by their action, so the whole solar system is united to, and modifies other systems, by which it is also modified. Thus humanity may be supposed to be one of a series of beings, superior and inferior.

"All is harmony; crime causes misery, elevation is the consequence of virtue"(16-17).

"We may find some passages in Sacred History, which can only be explained by supposing a pre-existence as well as a re-incarnation. The heavenly life may be commenced in this world—let us instance what is told us of Enoch and Elijah. Mons. Berthet, a celebrated and learned translator (but not an advocate of re-incarnation), thus gives a text in his Apocalypse of St. John:—'I will not punish eternally and I will not be angry forever; but the soul shall go from my hands, and I will give it a "Nephesch," that is to say, a vital breath, which shall bestow upon it an incarnation.' The Saviour himself proclaimed that Elias had already come, but that he was not acknowledged; and the Disciples understood that it was of John that he spake. Many other instances might be quoted of questions asked, and words spoken to the Saviour, shewing the belief of the Jews in pre-existence; yet the wisdom of the Son of God neither reproved or corrected them. 'Did this man sin or his father,' &c. &c.—'Paradise'—'Purgatory'—'Hell,' as distinct abodes, do they not imply a plurality of worlds? and there is but a step between the 'plurality of existences' and the plurality of worlds. Jesus Christ did not enlighten his Disciples upon every matter—they were taught all truths necessary to them, and to those they were to convert; in due time, through the influence of the Spirit, they were to learn and to teach more progressively, the Redeemed will be led to all truth and all happiness—God who, in the fulness of time sent the promised Messiah as King and Saviour, through a plurality of existences as well as through a plurality of mansions, has he not guided and formed the spirits he has made; not through darkness, but through light; not for destruction, but for salvation; and in the belief of a pre-existent and a future life, the Phantom of Necessity will disappear, and Hypocrisy, Terror and Misbelief will no longer follow thousands from their cradles to their graves"(17-19).

"It may be as well to repeat that the idea of successive existences is to be traced in the Temples of Egypt, in Persia, in India, and in Gaul. Origen was of the opinion that Druidical worship was derived from the Jews. . . . [similarity between treatment of oak as sacred tree, monotheism, sacrifice] There is another curious belief which was entertained by the Druids. According to this, the universe consisted of three circles. The 1st, that of immensity, belonged only to God; the 2nd, that of happiness (Paradise?), received those beings who had been purified and perfected by trial; the 3rd circle, one of unceasing movement and progression, received the souls which were rising or falling, according to their improvement or their retrogression. As our earth belongs to the circle of change, it follows that it is a world of expiation and of trial; evil being to a certain point a necessity; without evil free will could not be exercised. One idea in their theology enforced a grand and beautiful moral. To murmur against the course of Providence was to find fault with the general plan of the universe; as each individual must be supposed to occupy the post for which he was designed, and every even to occur according to the will and the design of the Creator.

"Pre-existence is indispensable if any succession of lives be admitted, for the soul must have an indefinite duration in the past as well as in the future, and thus death is but one of the portals to eternal life. Yet it can only be after the soul is purified, that it can be rendered capable of enduring the full knowledge of good and evil. It will then be permitted to remember and to comprehend the great value of our numerous transformations. It is supposed that the Druids places the scenes of our successive lives in the stars, and therefore astronomy was considered by them the first of sciences"(14-15).

Excerpt (pages): Book II (Magi/Persia): "Arimanius, chief of the Jyngas, aspired to an equality with the god Mythras, and by his eloquence persuaded all the spirits of his order to disturb the universal harmony, and the peace of the heavenly monarchy"(64). Sphere of Arimanius became chaos, rearranged by Mythras, and were allocated to different planets in the solar system "These spirits had been voluntary accomplices of Arimanius's crime"-those who had been persuaded because of "weakness, inadvertency, levity and. . . friendship for their companions" became mortals with "no remembrance of their former state, or of their ancient happiness; it is from this number of genii that the earth is peopled, and it is hence that we see here minds of all characters. The god Mythras is incessantly employed to cure, purify and exalt them, that they may be capable of their first felicity. Those who debase themselves by vice, sink deeper and deeper into matter, fall successively into the bodies of the meanest animals, and run through a perpetual circle of new forms, till they are purged of their crimes by the pains they undergo. The evil principle will confound every thing for nine thousand years; but at length there will come a time, fixed by destiny, when Arimanius will be totally destroyed and exterminated, the earth will change its form, universal harmony will be restored, and men will live happy without any bodily want. Until that time Oromazes reposes himself, and Mythras combats; this interval seems long to mortals, but, to God, it is only as a moment of sleep"(65-66).

Book III: Attributed by Egyptian Amenophis to Hermes: Before Typhon broke the egg of the world and introduced evil, "the ethereal matter penetrated all the parts of the virgin earth. . . . The inward constitution of bodies was then visible, because everything was luminous or transparent; the earth receiving or reflecting the rays of light, produced the agreeable clarity of colours, and there was nothing dark or dazzling. After the fall of spirits, and the revolt of Typhon, this beautiful order was destroyed"(80). The goddess Isis spoke, "nature obeyed her voice, and the shapeless chaos took a form; yet so, as that art and seeming chance, light and darkness, order and confusion, were mingled throughout. The earth was now opaque, ugly and irregular, like the intelligences that inhabit it"(80-81).

In the beginning, there existed a terrestrial life of paradise in which each man studied virtue and truth according his own particular qualities and inclinations; just, pure, "love of pleasure was always regulated by the love of order."(98) Osiris, isis, and their son Orus visited and talked with men. After a certain time, "men changed their form without dying, and flew away to the stars, where with new faculties and new light they discovered new truths, and enjoyed new pleasures; from thence they were raised to another world, thence to a third, and so travelled through the immense spaces by endless metamorphoses"(98). Then Typhon, chief of the genii and company "being intoxicated with pride, and forgetting themselves so far as to attempt to scale heaven, they were thrown down headlong, and buried in the centre of the earth" escaped, broke the egg, and diffused evil. "The soul of the great Osiris forsook his body, which is NATURE, and it became a carcass"(98). Fall of man. Orus attacks the evil principle to restore the kingdom of Osiris.

Book 6: Crete: Pythagoras

In the "golden age," "inhabitants of the earth lived in perfect innocence"(152). "The soul was not then imprisoned in a mortal body, as it is now; it was united to a luminous, heavenly, ethereal body, which served it as a vehicle to fly through the air, rise to the stars, and wander over all the regions of immensity.(152)" Sometimes this spirit sat at the tables of the gods, "at other times Jupiter, attended by all the divinities, mounted his winged chariot, and conducted them above the heavens. The poets have not celebrated, nor known that HIGHEST PLACE; it was there that the souls beheld truth, justice and wisdom in their source; it was there that with the eyes of the pure spirit they contemplated the first Essence, of whose brightness Jupiter and the other gods are but so many rays; there they were nourished with beholding that object, till being no longer able to support its splendour, they descended again to their ordinary abode" (152). After the fall, caused by negligence and "separating the love of pleasure from the love of order," "[t]he wings of the soul were clipt; its subtle vehicle was broken; the spirits were thrown down into mortal bodies, where they undergo divers transmigrations, till they are purged of their crimes by expiatory pains. The ethereal body was contracted, imprisoned, and buried in a living sepulchre, a coarse covering, which is ever changing, which does not continue one moment the same, and is something merely accidental to our substance. The immortal seed, the incorruptible body, the subtle vehicle is at present the seat of the soul, and the channel of communication between the pure spirit and the gross body, the hidden spring of all the motions and operations of our walking carcass"(153). After ten thousand years, Saturn will return and "Resume the reins of his empire, and restore the universe to its original splendour. All souls will then be reunited to their principle"(153).

At Mandane's death: "souls never die; they are only condemned for a time to animate mortal bodies, that they may expiate the faults they have committed in a former state"(200).

Cyrus to Daniel: Eleazar "has removed all my difficulties about the origin of evil, by proving the freedom of intelligent natures; he shuts the mouth of impiety, by his sublime ideas concerning the pre-existence of souls, their voluntary fall, and their total restoration"(230). (See also 224-225.)

Ramsay notes that the doctrine of pre-existence created to explain the existence of good and evil and to explain agency (295)

Comment: This entry refers to a Christian sect which believed that Christ was a pre-existent being distinct from God the Father. Some Arians also believed that Christ acted as a "Second Cause" or Creator. The excerpt below contains some summary and some direct quotation.

Excerpt (pages): "Arians": [A denomination arising in 315 AD. Arius, presbyter of Alexandria,] "maintained that the Son was totally and essentially distinct from the Father; that he was the first and noblest of all those beings whom God the Father had created out of nothing, the instrument by whose subordinate operation the Almighty Father formed the universe, and therefore inferior to the Father both in nature and dignity" (27).
[Arians also believed that the Holy Ghost differed in degree from the Father and the Son, since that Being was made by the Son. These beliefs rested upon the fact that Christ cites another God distinct from himself in scripture. Arians disagreed among themselves as to whether Christ was almost divine or almost human.] "The term Arian is now indiscriminately applied to those who consider Jesus simply subordinate to the Father" (29). [Some Arians believe Christ was the creator; all agree that he pre-existed in some form.]

Here, Priestley espouses a Christian materialism that claims the "the proper unity of God. . . and the proper humanity of Christ"(iii). This massive "history of ideas" chronicles metaphysical debates about matter and spirit beginning in Eastern and Western antiquity.

Comment: These excerpts discuss the possible evolution of the theory of pre-existence and describe various doctrines of the origin, and pre-existence, of human souls (including Christ's). They also suggest that the purpose of mortal life is to atone for sins willingly committed in a pre-existent state, sins which may have included a predilection for base matter. They also touch on the relationship between spirit and matter.

Excerpt (pages): "It would be most natural, however, at first, to ascribe the cause of thought to something that made a visible difference between a living and a dead man; and breathing being the most obvious difference of this kind, those powers would be ascribed to his breath: and accordingly we find, that in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, the name of the soul is the same with that of breath . . . ."(210). "But living bodies differ from dead ones by their warmth, as well as by the circumstance of breathing. Hence might come the idea of the principle of life and thought being a kind of vital fire; and, as flame always ascends, men would, of course, imagine that the soul of man, when set loose from the body, would ascend to the region of fire, which was supposed to be above the atmosphere. From these leading ideas, it could not be difficult for the imagination of speculative men to make out a complete system of pre-existence and transmigration. . . . "(211). "Diseases and other evils having their seat in the body, the matter of which it is composed might easily be conceived to be the source of those and all other evils. . . . Lastly, what could be more natural to account for the ethereal soul being confined to such a body or clog, as the supposition of its being a punishment for offences committed in a pre-existent state?"(212).

"Of [the souls of men Plato] distinguished two parts, the superior, which was an emanation from the Deity himself, and the inferior, which derived its origin from the more spiritual part of matter. . . . Plato's account of the cause of the descent of the soul has something peculiar in it, but which was not unknown in some of the Oriental systems. Others supposed, that they were condemned to a confinement in these bodies for offences committed in a pre-existent state; whereas he represents their desire of these mortal bodies to have been their original sin. He supposed, says Beausobre, that souls were touched with a secret desire to unite themselves to bodies, and that this terrestrial thought was a weight which dragged them to this lower world"(237). [To Plato, earth is a] "prison"(238).

"Origen says, it was not determined by the church, whether a soul was produced by another soul, whether it be eternal, or created for a certain time; whether it animates the body, or is only confined in it. But himself, being a Platonist, held, that souls had been from eternity, that they are sent into bodies as into a prison, for a punishment of their sins. Of course, he believed the transmigration of souls. So also did the Cabalists"(247). "All philosophers who believed the immortality of the soul, believed its pre-existence, thinking it impossible that the soul should subsist after the body, if it had not existed before it; and Lactantius has remarked, that all the ablest Greek Fathers embraced this opinion, and were followed in it by the ablest of the Latins also.

"The Oriental doctrine was, however, adopted by the Greeks with considerable variations, some of the philosophers holding, that souls were sent into bodies for offences committed in a pre-existent state, but others, by the sovereign will of God. The opinion of the evil nature of matter also appeared in Greece, together with the first idea of a God, the doctrine of two principles being very apparent. . . "(319).

"We have seen that it was a fundamental doctrine in the East, and likewise in the Platonic system, that, on account of the mixture of evil in the world, it could not be supposed to have been made by the supreme Being himself; but that it was formed from pre-existent matter, by a celestial spirit, a principal emanation from the divine mind, the Birmah of the Hindoos, the prima mens of the Chaldeans, the [Greek words: nous and logos?] of Plato. And what was more natural than to suppose, that the restorer of the human race had been the former of it. . . " (348-49).

"Perhaps the greatest disservice that the introduction of philosophy did to christianity was, that, in consequence of the general doctrine of the pre-existence of all human souls, the soul of Christ was, of course, supposed to have had a pre-existent state, and also to have had a superior rank and office before he came into the world, suitable to the power and dignity with which he appeared to be invested on earth" (347).

"'Austin,' says Beausobre, 'believed Christ to be a mere man, though much exalted above others by divine gifts, till he learned of the books of Plato, translated by Victorinus, that the Logos existed before all things, that he was from eternity with God, that he created all things, that he is the only Son of the Father, and, finally, equal to the Father, being of the same substance with himself'"(351).

"Among the later Fathers, we find three opinions relating to the origin of the soul. First, that souls were created when the body was ready to receive them; another, that they came from God, and are inclosed in the male seed; another, that the first soul, viz. that of Adam, was made of nothing, and that all the rest came from this by ordinary generation"(248).

Cabalists believed that "the soul, being an emanation from the Deity, had the power of multiplying itself without end, because every part of the Deity is infinite; so that they believed that all souls were contained in that of Adam, and sinned with him"(244). [Tertullian believed that the soul formed at the same time the body was formed (246).]

To which is added, Some Thoughts upon CREATION in General, upon Pre-existence, the Cabalistic Account of the Mosiac Creation, the Formation of Adam, and Fall of Mankind; and upon the Nature of Noah's Deluge. As also upon the DORMANT STATE of the SOUL, from the Creation to our Birth, and from our Death to the Resurrection. The Whole considered upon the Principles of Reason, and from the Tenor of the Revelations in the Holy Scriptures."
The title page lists the author as "an IMPARTIAL INQUIRER after Truth." The Brigham Young University Library online catalog lists Richard Cosway (or R. Casway) as the primary supposed author, though James Ralph, a "miscellaneous writer" and American expatriate living in London, is also listed as a second supposed author. Ralph, who lived from 1705? to 1762, was a onetime friend of Benjamin Franklin, and even assumed Franklin's name when he moved to England. He worked as a hack-writer and made an enemy in Alexander Pope, who dismissed him as a 'low writer.' Ralph wrote a variety of political critiques and histories and edited the "Champion," an anti-ministerial paper, with Henry Fielding. The Dictionary of National Biography lists many publications written or attributed to Ralph, but A Miscellaneous Metaphysical Essay is not among them, nor does Ralph seem to have been concerned with the issues discussed in this work. However, the Biography mentions that "Franklin reproaches himself with unsettling Ralph's religious opinions," so the connection could be possible. "James Ralph," Dictionary of National Biography, Vol. XVI, ed. Leslie Stephens and Sidney Lee (London: Oxford University Press, 1959-60); 664-667.
Comment: This work provides a "Hermetic" source with which to compare LDS teachings about the pre-existence. (Cf. John Brooke's claims about Hermetic source material in his 1994 book The Refiner's Fire.) Metaphysical Essay proposes the existence of distinct spiritual entities called monads that enjoy the properties of both spirit and matter. It also proposes a doctrine of pre-existence that functions as a theodicy, or defense of God's goodness. This theory posits pre-existent sin, views mortality as a punishment, and includes the process of reincarnation. It also describes the conflict in heaven, mentions various worlds on which spirits were "imprisoned," and recites more commonly-accepted theories about the soul's origin. It also explains that those without the gospel are "the irreclaimable."

Excerpt (pages): "The general Notion that at present prevails, is, that after Conception, when the Body of the Fœetus is formed, God almighty creates a Soul, and injects it into the Body, and from that Moment the Body is animated. But does this seem consistent, that the all-wise, just and good God, should daily exert his Almighty Power, and create an immaculate and faultless Soul, of an angelic Nature, and place it in a corrupt Body, liable to all the Fraillties, Passions, and Infirmitiies, we are subject to, in our Sojournment in this Globe, from the Power our plastic Nature has over our rational and spiritual Soul; and that these spiritual Beings should be daily liable to offend him, and to be guilty of Sin, and liable to Death, and future Punishment, and yet not have natural Powers sufficient to preserve themselves from Sin and Punishment? Or can we suppose our great God so far concurring with adulterous and incestuous Pollutions, as to exert his Almighty Power daily, and inject a Soul into the Foetus formed by their Act of Coition? This seems inconsistent with the divine moral Rectitude of the Deity, and would seem to be a Sanction to their Actions: I must therefore differ from those who are of this Opinion. . . ."(61-62).

"The next Opinion offered is, that our Souls were all originally in the first Adam; and that both our Spirits and bodies are all come from him; and, by throwing off one Tegument or Skin after another, at each Conception, we at last appear in the World in the Condition we are now in: But this seems to be too much of a Piece with the Materialists, who may believe our Souls, like Matter in their Conception, divisible infinitely; for this would confirm that their Hypothesis, that our Souls are material, and infinitely divisible; and that there are Souls within Souls, looking backwards as far as Thought can reach; for Myriads of Millions are included in the Vehicle of one, since so many Souls or Animacules are thrown off at each Act of Copulation, as we now observe by Microscopes, when in the least Drop of Semen there are such surprising Numbers seen. This would also confirm their opinion, who imagine, that Souls take up no Room or Place in Space, by being infinitely small; and may thus, in a manner, be conceived not to be any-where: Whereas, from the Powers we observe in ourselves, and other spiritual Beings, we must take up Room, and be extended in Space, since we act in a limited Part of it.

"The last and most agreeable Hypothesis, which seems more consistent with the Apparatus of all Things about us, is, That our Souls have had a Being long before our Appearance in this Stage of Life; that we have had our Being since the first Creation of all Things, perhaps an indefinite Series of Ages before the Mosaic Creation; and that as we find our Souls immortal for the time to come, or at least in Being, tho' perhaps in a dormant State, until the Resurrection, as being indivisible and indiscerpible, so our Beings have been from the first Creation of the Angelic Orders of Being, when the Morning Stars sung together, and all the Sons of God shouted for Joy: That some of these Beings, particularly human Souls, have been conscious heretofore, and, by the Freedom of their Wills, may have erred: They may have been perhaps too vain-glorious of the Faculties, and have not given the due Submission they ought, to the Commands laid upon them by their Almighty Creator; and so may have lain dormant, in a quiescent State, from the Mosaic Creation; and may thus have been doom'd to our earthy Vehicles, as to a State of Trial and Probation here; And this may be what is meant in Scripture by the Fall of Adam, and the Reconciliation made by our Blessed Redeemer, to strengthen and support us in our Pilgrimage here. This is the Reason why we are represented, in Holy Writ, as Strangers seeking our Way home to our native Country: But had we never been Inhabitants of that heavenly Paradise before the Mosaic Creation; or if our Souls were only created at or after Conception here, or even at the Formation of Adam; we had not Pretensions to call the aethereal Regions our Home, or be said to return to it. Nor is it at all inconsistent, that we should be deprived of the Knowlege or Remembrance of what we were before our Entrance into these our earthy Mansions; since, in many Instances, we forget what daily happens to us; and, when dormant, we forget most of the Transactions of our Lives: Nay, our Saviour's Soul, which we allow pre-existed, forgot many of his Transactions, and his Knowlege of Things before, or he could not, from his Birth, be said to increase in Knowlege, as well as in Stature" (64-66). Explains objections to paying for Adam's sin and doom innocent souls to damnation.

Main hypothesis: "By which it seems probable, that the several Particles of Beings around us are spermatical and vital, and not made of mere passive Matter, supported by mechanical Laws; and that our Souls have pre-existed, as well as other Beings, for an indeterminate Number of Ages; even long before the Mosaic Account of the Formation of the Globe. . . . "(92).

Hierarchy of monads (97-98). Also: "We have great Reason to believe, that the superior Parts of the several Atmospheres, and the aethereal Regions, are filled with Beings of higher Orders, and superior Powers and Sensations; I should incline to believe, that all the several Globes, Suns, Planets, and Comets, are Prisons, wherein Beings formerly endowed with Life in the aethereal regions, who from the Freedom of their Wills have misbehaved, and lapsed, are confined; and most of them reduced to a dormant State, or Death, except such as are animated upon their several Surfaces, until, by the various Turns of Providence in Eternity, they may be allowed to appear in Life; or may be, perhaps, made up of many Beings never yet endowed with Life, but who by their active Principle may live hereafter; and in the mean time are as a Substratum, or Stage, necessary to carry out the Transactions of Providence"(109-110).

"I shall suppose then, that the Almighty Being had created, by Emanations from himself, a Number of finite, active, spiritual Monads, or Beings, as early as it was possible for his Will to act; which I must conceive to be from an indefinite Eternity, considering time as a Fluent, his Will being coeval with his Power, which was from Eternity, and agreeable to his eternal and infinite Goodness, which consists in communicating his Goodness and Happiness to others, as soon as it might be done, from the Nature of Things, as far as infinite Wisdom could direct; and that his Goodness should be as extensive as possible, and consequently be communicated to as great a Number as the Divine Wisdom could govern, and dispose of, . . . which must also be conceived to be infinite. . . . I must also, in contemplating upon the same Goodness and Wisdom, believe, that as many of these Beings. . . were active, spiritual, endowed with Life, Consciousness, and Perceptions, and capable of enjoying Happiness, in a proper Subordination, where infinite Wisdom presided, as it was possible to have made. . . . I must also believe, that these . . . Beings were endowed with Reason to regulate their Actions, and had a Freedom of Will to act. . . Consequently, in such a Society, Rewards and Punishments were necessary. . . in proportion to their Obedience or Disobedience to the Laws established by the Divine Being, to regulate the Actions of a Society endowed with such Freedom of Will and Power of Action. I must also conceive that . . . [such conscious Beings] might be capable, from time to time, of having greater Powers and Knowledge communicated to them, or to be deprived of such Power and Knowledge as they had. . . . I must also conceive, that as these active spiritual Beings are finite, and of different Powers and Capacities; so they must be capable of Amplitude and Figure, and occupy Space, and are capable of Motion, or Changing of Place in Space. . . . Therefore, as either Part of their Substance of Nature, or inseparably united to them, they must have a Vehicle or Form, which individuates them, and gives them a Form or Figure in Space; . . . I am of Opinion, whatever way it us [whether the Passions and Affections are inherent or added on to our essential natures], that without our Passions and Affections we cannot be completely happy or miserable, and that, in order to our being rewarded or punished, they are a necessary Part of our Being. . . . And tho' I am inclined to believe, that all the active conscious Beings were made from the Beginning, or first Formation of Beings (for, tho' it may be termed from Eternity, yet, as we can't conceive an adequate Notion of Eternity, considering it only as a Fluent by Succession, we must use such flowing Terms, and call it a Beginning); yet I must conceive, that all those spiritual Beings have not ever been, or shall ever be, conscious. If they have been Emanations from the Supreme Deity, they may have been formed, or flowed out in Succession, at different Periods, and may again be absorbed, if that should be agreeable to Divine Wisdom" (Casway 260-265).
"These being premised [the advancement of Beings in Goodness, Knowledge and Power, depending on their Righteousness], according to this Hypothesis, I suppose, that these intellectual Beings, these active conscious Spirits, in this golden Age, this primitive State of the Universe, when all was universal Day, either being coequal, or in regular Subordination to each other, according to the Situation in which infinite Wisdom was pleased to place them; that many of these Beings, or different Orders of Beings, either envying the Promotion of other Spirits, of which, by their Indolence or Selfishness, they had made themselves unworthy; or otherwise thinking themselves worthy of the Rewards they were no-ways intitled to; they, giving way to their Passions and selfish Appetites, thro' Pride, broke thro' the Laws of the Universe, the Laws of society established by the Divine Being: And, since we find the Supreme Being acting in our material World by Second Causes, so we have Reason to believe, that, before the Commencement of our material System, he also acted by Second Causes amongst the angelic Powers; . . . That, accordingly, in this Distribution of Rewards and Favours, the Soul of the Messiah, for his supereminent Zeal and Obedience to the Supreme Being, was exalted above all the Orders of Angels; and that Lucifer, then one of the superior Orders, at the Head of a numerous Train, being filled with Pride and Self-merit, openly declared against such Distribution of Rewards as the Almighty thought proper to make by Second Causes, the superior Orders of Angels; and they finding themselves secluded from such Rewards as their selfish Pride thought they deserved, and that the Soul of the Messiah, who might have been of the same Order, or perhaps a lower Order than Lucifer, and those Orders who adhered to him, was advanced to their Prejudice, they actually transgressed the Laws of Society, and claimed, by Force, to be rewarded above their Merit; and perhaps Lucifer claimed the Place and Dignity to which the Messiah's Soul had been raised, and demanded that the Messiah should be degraded. . . . The Supreme Being then appointed the Messiah's Soul, to whom he communicated the Fulness of his Spirit and power, by uniting him to the Logos, his Divine Wisdom, Prince over all the angelic Host who were obedient; and he, at the Head of the angelic Host, quell'd the Rebellion raised by Lucifer and his Adherents; deprived him of the Light and Power he bore, with all the rebellious Host, his Associates; expelled them the aethereal Regions, and, by contracting their Vehicles, either by withdrawing the luminous aethereal fluid with which they had been inflated, or by confining them to other Machine-Vehicles of fewer Organs and Powers, threw them down into the several grand Abysses, the Centers of our several Systems; where they were impell'd by the angelic Host, and surrounding Aether, and made to gravitate upon each other, and to attract and repel each other, according to the Similitude of their Natures and Crimes; which may be the Cause of the Sympathies and Antipathies we observe in Nature; and there they may have been bound in Chains of Darkness, for many Ages before the Formation of our System." (Casway 270-272).

"The Soul of the Messiah, after his Exaltation, and being made Prince and General of the obedient angelic Host, and after having conquered the rebellious Angels, and expell'd them from the aethereal Regions, and impell'd them into the Abysses, the Centers of our several Systems, where they were confined to Matter, . . . knowing that many different Orders of Being were concerned in the Lapse and Rebellion, and that some of these were drawn in by Orders of superior Knowledge and Power, but were not principal in the Revolt . . . and perhaps drawn in by other lesser Motives; he offered himself as Mediator and Intercessor with the Almighty Being, God the Father, not only for such as had fallen thro' Weakness and Inadvertency, in joining the superior Orders, but also for such who had opposed his Exaltation; and, upon Condition that God the Father would allow them to become conscious, and would place them in a State of Probation, before the general Judgment would be held, he would empty himself of that Glory to which he had been advanced, and would take human Nature upon him, in that State of Life in which they should be allowed to act, during their State of Probation; and would submit to the Frailties and Infirmities of their Nature, which they were doom'd to be imprison'd in for their Lapse; that, by his Obedience in that State, he might atone for all such who had been inadvertently drawn in; and even for all those who had opposed his Exaltation. . . . This Declaration and Offer, and the Acceptance of it, made all the Sons of God, the angelic Host, shout with Joy; and the whole Heavens, thro' the infinite Expanse, echo with the Praise of the superabundant Goodness of the Messiah our Redeemer, who would deprive himself of his Glory and Happiness, for a time, to restore those to the Favour of God, who had opposed his Exaltation; but did not do it for those, who had rebelled in Defiance of the Almighty Will and Power. Thus God the Father made him the Creator of our present System. . . . "(Casway 74-276).

Some spirits were imprisoned in "fossil, vegetable, or animal brutal Life" will be judged for former crimes(278). "That only to such as our Saviour Jesus Christ had interposed for Mercy, a State of Probation was allowed, by their entering human Bodies, they having been allowed sufficient Machines and Organs to afford them Reason, Memory, and Judgment, to make them accountable for their Behaviour and Actions here"(278). "That afterwards [after being thrust down and imprisoned in a stupor in the Suns and planets] many of these [Beings], at the time of the Mosaic Creation, were allowed to come into different Degrees of Life. . . .; upon the Supposition also, that many of these, who had egregiously lapsed, may have taken human Vehicles, and yet be doom'd here, to be in an intermediate State of Punishment, before their final Sentence; that also other Beings, who had not lapsed so enormously, were placed here, not only in a State of Punishment, but at the same time in a State of Probation, assisted by the Intercession and Mediation of the Divine Logos our Messiah, and that also a third Class of Beings were allowed to take Life here, elected to be shining Lights, to assist the others in their State of Probation"(279-280). Christ died only for the Elect and those on probation. See also 292-
294. The Hypothesis that Christ died only for the elect, and that the rest of mankind is irreclaimable, explains the seeming inequity of revealed religion only to a few Christians.306-308
This source also states that progression is effected through reincarnation of spirits, according to their degree of obedience; spiritual monads are also attached to a vehicle which allows them to fulfill themselves (117). Spirits are from emanations of the Divine Being (131).

Title of Article: "Sermon II: The Creation of Man an important work of God"

Place of Publication: Salem, Massachusetts

Publisher: Henry Whipple

Nature of Source: A collection of 39 sermons by Samuel Worcester, Senior Pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Massachusetts. The sermons were edited and published by Henry Whipple after Worcester's death. Worcester was, according to the book's preface, best known for his position as Corresponding Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, but he gave many sermons before the public and had published some previous discourses which were "favourably received" (iii). Sermon II is based upon Isaiah XLV 12: "I have made the earth, and created man upon it." It asserts that human creation was an important work of God.

Comment: According to Worcester, human creation was an important work of God because 1) the creative process was "solemn" and careful and resulted in a being of "high dignity" and "immortal nature"; 2) the human body and soul demonstrate the Creator's "perfections"; 3) the sheer number of souls created is impressive; 4) the battle between good and evil that resulted from the creation and fall of man has tremendous ramifications. When contemplating human creation, Worcester continues, people should become aware of their dependence on God, be grateful for his goodness, condemn the first revolt of man as "wholly inexcusable, and exceedingly ungrateful and criminal"(40), remember that "the ultimate happiness and glory of the redeemed, from among men, must be transcendentally great"(40), and recognize the overwhelming "inconsiderateness and stupidity" of humans' everyday actions (41).

The following excerpt explains how the human spirit (soul) was formed in the image of God; i.e., the human spirit "really" reflects God's intelligence and his holiness. Worcester seems ambivalent about the timeline for creation of spirits (he seems not to care whether spirits were individually pre-existent and created at the same time, whether individual pre-existent spirits are created continuously as needed, or whether all spirits were latent in Adam (traducianism)); however, he states that spirits are "capable of endless advancement in knowledge, in goodness, and in happiness." However, Worcester's other works would not permit the possibility of spirits co-eternal with God, and his sermons are emphatic about the absolute dependency of humans. One interesting aspect of this sermon is his reference to "the sons of God shouting for joy" "in view of the rising creation"—but Worcester does not explain this scriptural phrase, nor make any overt reference to a pre-existent state.

Excerpt (pages): "A spirit was infused into [the body of man], and the inspiration of the Almighty gave him understanding; a spirit, immortal in nature, allied to heavenly beings, and impressed with the image of God" (33).

"So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him. The divine consultation on the subject, and the emphatical repetition here employed, strongly evince, that the image, or likeness of God, in which man was created, was real, and most excellent. As God is a being of infinite intelligence, so man was made an intelligent being. As God is a being of infinite holiness, so man was made perfectly holy. In this he bore the image of God in the highest sense. Those of our now fallen race, who are renewed by the Holy Spirit, are said to be created after God; that is, in his image, or likeness; in righteousness and true holiness" (34).

"But the body, fearfully and wonderfully made, as it is, can bear no comparison with the invisible and immortal part of man. A soul, created in the image of God, endued with all the powers of a rational and moral being, formed for the noblest pursuits and enjoyments, and capable of endless advancement in knowledge, in goodness, and in happiness, is surely an object which, the more we contemplate, the more we shall see cause to admire. Nothing in the material universe can bear any comparison with it; nothing in the material universe so illustriously shows forth the glory of God. The human soul and body united, undoubtedly constituted the noblest and most wonderful of all the Creator's works, in this lower world; and, as such, was a work of vast importance, in respect to the display of his adorable perfections. Doubtless, on beholding this work, the morning stars, who sang together, and all the sons of God, who shouted for joy, in view of the rising creation, raised their grateful notes with redoubled acclamations" (36).

"Whether the souls of all mankind were actually created, as some suppose, at the time of Adam's creation, or whether they are successively created, as the bodies designed for them are ready to receive them; whether they are infused into their respective bodies immediately by the Creator, or whether they are propagated with their bodies by natural traduction; unquestionably, the existence of all their posterity was infallibly connected with the creation of the first human pair. The first parents of our race were so formed, or under such a constitution created, that all mankind were, in some sense, contained in them, and to be propagated from them; so that, in creating them, and giving the benediction, or command, to be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, God, in effect, at the same time created the whole human family" (36).

Let us remember, that magnificent as this great dome of nature is, and richly as it is stored with the fruits of divine goodness, it is not intended for our permanent abode. We are here, for a short season only, on probation for another and an eternal state. We shall soon be gone hence, and have no more concern forever, with the comforts of the sufferings, with the joys or the sorrows, with the hopes or the fears, of this sublunary scene. The world itself, indeed, is not to abide forever. But, the day of the Lord is coming, is hastening on, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. Happy, happy for us, if in that great day, we be admitted to the new heavens, or the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Happy, if when our earthly house of this tabernacle shall be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (29-30).

Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Manning and Loring, for S. Hall, etc.
Date of Publication: 1795
Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phonecia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Dirodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Excerpt (pages): Valley near the Persian Gulf: "There they beheld, by the side of a clear fountain, a great number of men of all ages, and over against them a company of women, who formed a concert. They understood that it was the school of the Magi and were surprised to see, instead of austere, melancholy and thoughtfult men, an agreeable and polite people" who considered music a "heavenly" way to "calm the passions," took daily exercise, and offered homage on "the sacred mountain" "rather by the voice of the heart than of the lips" (46). The magi started education in the womb; "Each sage had his province in the empire of philosophy. Some studied the virtues of plants, others the metamorphoses of insects; some again the conformation of animals, and others the course of the stars. But the aim of all their researches was to come to the knowledge of the gods and of themselves. They said, that the sciences were no farther valuable than they served as steps to ascend to the great Oromazes, and from thence to descend to man" (47). "Zororaster laid open to Cyrus the secrets of nature, not merely to gratify his curiousity, but to make him observe the marks of an infinite Wisdom diffused throughout the universe, and thereby the guard his mind against irreligion" (55).

Title of Book: The Bible Meaning of the Word Hell

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: World's Crisis

Date of Publication: n.d. (see "nature of source")

Nature of Source: Blain is a destructionist: opposed to Universalism because he believes that not everyone will be saved, but also opposed to doctrines of endless misery, since he believes in the final annihilation of the unrepentant. This discourse was first published as the third chapter of Blain's Death not Life, or the Literal Destruction of the Wicked Established, and Endless Misery Disproved, a 160 page work published in 1853 in Buffalo, New York, and in its fifteenth edition by 1871. The discourse summarized here includes a three page summary of Death not Life. It was included on a microfilm collection of the works of Early Adventist, or Post-Millerite, groups from 1844-1870. See Ronald L. Numbers and Jonathan M. Butler, eds, The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987).

Comment: Blain considers four words translated as "hell" in order to prove that hell is not a place meant "as a prison for the eternal misery of men and devils" (43). In the process, he touches on spirit prison, the problems of translation, corruption of biblical texts, spiritual (second) death, and endless punishment.

Excerpt (pages): "In the first place, let us hear what Dr. George Campbell, a Presbyterian commentator of Scotland, says on two words translated hell. 'In my judgment,' he says, 'hades ought never, in Scripture, to be rendered hell; at least in the sense wherein that word is now universally understood by Christians. In the O.T., the corresponding word is sheol, which signifies the state of the dead in general, without regard to the goodness or badness of persons, their happiness or misery. Hades signifies obscure, hidden, invisible.' See Diss. Vol. 1, pp. 180, 181. He elsewhere says, 'The Saxon word hell originally meant only a pit, or covered place.' . . . I will next quote from Exegetical Essays, on several words relating to future punishment, by Moses Stuart, Professor in the Theological Seminary at Andover. On page 93 he says, 'Sheol is used sixty-three times in the O.T. and translated hell thirty-one times, grave thirty, and pit three. It is pit in Num. 16:30-33; Job 17:16.' . . . On Page 122 he says, 'Where is the specific difference between the future state of the righteous and wicked, fully set forth in the Hebrew Scriptures? Where are the separate abodes in sheol for each, particularly described? I know not nor do I believe any one can inform me.' Page 113 he says, 'On the whole, it is to be regretted that our English translation has given occasion to the remarks, that those who made it, have intended to impose on their readers in any case, a sense different from that of the original Hebrew. * * * I am inclined to believe that in their day, the word hell had not acquired, so exclusively as at present, the meaning of a world of future misery." (43-45).

"The Greek word Tartarus, used but once, and translated hell in 2 Peter 2:4, is relied on to prove there is a world of misery. Here we need no authority, for the Bible forbids this idea. 'God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to Tartarus, and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment.' An imprisonment for a limited time is here spoken of, while no place is named, as Tartarus here can only convey the idea of a prison, in the sense of John 3:36. . . [John 3:18; 2 Peter 2:9; Jude 6] If devils are confined to a local place it is on earth. See Job 1:7; 1 Pet. v.8; 2 Cor. 4:4; Eph. 2:2: 'He goeth two and fro,' 'is god of this world,' 'rules in the children of disobedience;' so we are all in the same hell the devil is. . . ." (46).

"But the Greek word Gehenna, twelve times translated "hell" in the N.T. is the main term used to proved a world of torment in a future state. . . Stuart says, 'The word Gehenna is derived from the words Gi Hinnom, the valley of Hinnom.' He adds, 'It was a word used by the ancient Hebrews, and they are the only competent witnesses of its meaning.' The O.T., then, must be examined for this; for Dr. George Campbell says, 'Our Lord, we find from the Evangelists, spoke to his countrymen in the dialect of their own Scriptures, and used those names to which the reading of the law and the prophets had familiarized them.' I affirm, then, that Hinnom (Gehenna) is never used in the O.T. to mean a place of infernal punishment or world of woe. It is used, first, as the name of a literal place; and second, as a symbol of destruction, slaughter, death. So the Saviour used it" (46-47).

"I cannot think of any other literal place thus translated in the Bible. The precious book is darkened and corrupted by its translation. I am credibly informed that in versions in other languages it is seldom translated.

"Surely, the word hell is a wrong word to translate it into. Dr. Geo. Campbell says, 'At first hell denoted only what was secret or concealed.' Parkhurst says, 'Our English, or rather Saxon, word hell, in its original signification, exactly answers to the Greek word hades, and denotes a concealed or unseen place; and this sense of the word is still retained in the eastern, and especially in the western counties of England; to hele over a thing is to cover it.' Mr. Sabine says, 'It appears to me that in the time of this translation, hell, pit, and grave, were synonymous"(48-49).

"If the common theory of a local hell be correct, there must be three distinct hells taught in the Bible; two now in existence, and one to be built in the future. (1.) Hades, for souls between death and the judgement. (2.) Tartarus, (the atmosphere,) for the present home of devils. And (3.) Gehenna, to be provided somewhere, at the judgment.

"But we learn from God's word, that hades, the first hell, is to be destroyed. Rev. 20:14.
The devil's hell must be ended when he is destroyed; or, when 'the new heavens and new earth are made,' the 'air' will be so purified, that he will no longer be 'prince of it.'"(50).

". . . [T]he English student of the Bible, by long research, can find it teaches no endless hell, but simply a second death for the poor sinner. . . . In the first four chapters [of Death not Life] I first quote and explain 200 texts, proving the final doom of the impenitent to be literal destruction at the Judgement, called 'the second death.'"(51-I).

Blain reviews Conflict of Ages, a book by Edward Beecher (son of Dr. Lyman Beecher and brother of Henry Ward Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe) that was in its fifth edition only three months after it was published (2).

Comment: Blain addresses Beecher's thesis that seeming injustices of this life can be explained by positing a Fall in a pre-existent state. Blain disagrees with this final hypothesis, stating that evil does not compromise God's justice as long as evil itself is finite. This excerpt states Blain's denial of a "second," or "spiritual" death universally overcome by Christ. Death for the unrepentant means complete destruction.

Excerpt (pages): "I am happy to see the Doctor rejects the absurd common view, that the death threatened to Adam, was a 'compound one.' On pp.413-414, he says, 'we ought to interpret "death" in Rom. 5:12-19, by the sentence in Genesis; and this says nothing of spiritual and eternal death. It refers to temporal death, and to that only. The words are "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." If the Doctor should ever logically carry out this view, he must unavoidably become a destructionist. How are we to escape the 'death and dust' threatened, if we come not to Christ the 'tree of life?'"(12-13).

Title of Book: Jesus Christ the Resurrection and the Life

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Edmund Freeman

Date of Publication: 1786

Nature of Source: The full title of this sermon is Jesus Christ the Resurrection and the Life: a Discourse, Delivered at Truro, on Cape Cod, April 11, 1786, at the Interment of the Rev. Caleb Upham, Pastor of the Church of Christ in that Town. Presumably, Reverend Upham was a well-respected and beloved Pastor; this 22 page discourse was "published at the desire of the bereaved Flock" (title page). Levi Whitman, the author, was the Junior Pastor of the Church of Christ in Welfleet. In his sermon, he intimates that his ministry had only just begun

Comment: This funeral sermon is based on John 11:25-26: ". . . I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. . . ." Whitman clarifies the paradox in this scripture by explaining the difference between temporal and spiritual death and by suggesting how these two deaths can be overcome in Christ.

Whitman first focuses on the inevitability of temporal death as a result of sin, but he also testifies that Christ promises "the glorious hope of resurrection from the dead." Whitman then addresses the fate of the soul; while the bodies of the dead "sleep in the grave," he says, believing souls fly to paradise. Thus, "the second" or "spiritual" death is avoided through faith in Christ. Whitman makes no direct correlation between spiritual salvation and the possibility of repentance created by Christ's atonement. Instead, spiritual salvation is effected by a more nebulous "trust in Christ." Whitman also implies that "escape" from spiritual death is instantaneous and precedes the resurrection of the body.

Excerpt (pages): ". . . Jesus Christ is the author of the hope of eternal life, and of the hope we have of escaping spiritual and eternal death.

"The dissolution of the body we must submit to. Christ our great High-Priest and Redeemer, never meant to give any intimation to the contrary [in John 11:25-26], nor any thing to create in us the hope of escaping temporal death. What he meant was, that we, knowing that our flesh must see corruption, might have the advantage of knowing also the doctrine of the resurrection.

"But in respect to our souls, our better part, Christ informs us, that if we trust in him, they shall not taste of the second death; but shall have life abiding in them.

"Some indeed, have supposed, that the soul, at death, falls asleep with the body, and so continues until the resurrection. But one word from the mouth of an inspired Apostle, in opposition to this hypothesis, will be sufficient to invalidate the scheme, and overthrow the supposition. 'Absent from the body, and present with the Lord'" (15-16).

Excerpt (pages): "Many modern metaphysicians, finding some difficulty in uniting together things so discrepant in their nature, as a pure immaterial substance, and such gross matter, as that to which the human body and brain are composed, have imagined, that this connexion may be better cemented by means of some intermediate material substance, of a more refined and subtle nature than that which is the object of the sense of sight or touch. Upon the dissolution of the body by death, they suppose that this subtle vehicle of the soul is set loose from its connexion with it, and flies off, unperceived by any of the senses, together with the immaterial soul, from which it is inseparable, into the intermediate state" (103).

"'The human soul,' says Mr. Wollaston, 'is a cogitative substance, clothed in a material vehicle, or rather united to it, and as it were inseparably mixed (I had almost said incorporated) with it. These act in conjunction, that which affects the one, affecting the other. . . . [B]y means of this vehicle, motions and impressions are communicated to and fro" (105).

"On this I would observe, that by whatever considerations it appears that a vehicle is necessary to the soul, the body must at least be equally necessary to the vehicle" (106).

"Even Dr. Hartley, who ascribes so much to matter, and so little to any thing immaterial in man (nothing but the faculty of simple perception) yet supposes that there is sometime intermediate between the soul and the gross body, which he distinguishes by the name of the infinitesimal elementary body" (108).

[Confucius called angels or spirits] "air"-"They look upon it [the spirit] to be a material thing, though highly rarefied" (234).

Author: Andrew Michael Ramsay (Chevalier Ramsay)

Title of Book: The Travels of Cyrus: to Which Is Annexed, a Discourse upon the Theology and Mythology of the Pagans.

Title of Article:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Manning and Loring, for S. Hall, etc.

Date of Publication: 1795

Nature of Source: A popular fictional work relating the travel of Cyrus, Prince of Persia, through Persia, the Arabian Peninsula, Egypt, Corinth, Athens, Crete, Phonecia, and Assyria. Ramsay's aim is to "describe the religion, manners, and politics" of each area in order to prove the existence of an all-wise, all-powerful Creator (viii, x) and to demonstrate that "all nations were agreed in the doctrine of the three states of the world, the three forms of the divinity, and a middle god, who by his conflicts and great sufferings was to expiate and exterminate moral evil, and restore innocence and peace to the universe" (200). Footnotes in the work and the appended discourse indicate that Ramsay's sources included Herodotus, Plutarch, Origen, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Dirodorus. The 308 page volume includes a letter from "M. Freret, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris" which praises the book's historical "exactness" (308). An edition was published in London in 1727; at least 25 English versions were eventually published, in addition to multiple editions in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. The First American Edition was published in New Jersey in 1793. Ramsay lived from 1686-1743 (The National Union Catalog Pre-1965 Imprints, Volume 48. 1970: 408-412).

Comment: Throughout this work, Ramsay's characters and/or Ramsay are wary of "matter" and consistently reassert the fundamental differences between humans and the divine. These passages cast some doubt on John Brooke's assertion that Ramsay represents a "resynthesis of the hermetic tradition" which ostensibly preached human "divinization" and an "equation of spirit and matter" (The Refiner's Fire, 1996: 207, 28.)

Excerpt (pages): "Then Zororaster raised his thought to the stars, and explained to Cyrus how they all float in an active, uniform, and infinitely subtle fluid, which fills and pervades all nature. This invisible matter, said he, does not act by the necessary law of a blind mechanism. It is, as it were, the* body of the great Oromazes, whose soul is truth. By the one he acts upon all bodies, and by the other he enlightens all spirits. His vivifying presence gives activity to this pure ethar, which become thereby the primary mechanical spring of all the motions in the heavens and upon the earth. It causes the fixed stars to turn upon their axes, while to makes the planets circulate round those stars; it transmits with an incredible velocity the light of those heavenly bodies as the air does sounds; and its vibrations, as they are more or less quick, produce the agreeable variety of colours, as those of the air do the melodious notes of music. Lastly, the fluidity of liquids, the cohesion of solids, the gravitation, elasticity, attraction, fermentation of bodies, the sensation of animals, and the vegetation of plants, come all from the action of this exceeding subtle SPIRIT, which diffuses itself throughout all the immensity of spaces."

[59-60]. [NOTE] "*those who are unacquainted with the style of antiquity, imagine that Zororaster and Pythagoras make the Deity corporeal by this expression, and that it gave occasion to the error of the Stoics, who believed the Divine Essence an ethereal matter; but the contrary is evident by the definitions which those two philosophers give of the Divinity. (see 276, 284, 285). It seems to me, that by the body of God, they mean nothing more than what Sir Isaac Newton expresses by these words: [quotation in Latin]."

Book 6: [Crete: Pythagoras speaking]
The "golden age": "inhabitants of the earth lived in perfect innocence"(152). "The soul was not then imprisoned in a mortal body, as it is now; it was united to a luminous, heavenly, ethereal body, which served it as a vehicle to fly through the air, rise to the stars, and wander over all the regions of immensity.(152)" After the fall, caused by negligence and "separating the love of pleasure from the love of order," "[t]he wings of the soul were clipt; its subtle vehicle was broken; the spirits were thrown down into mortal bodies, where they undergo divers transmigrations, till they are purged of their crimes by expiatory pains. The ethereal body was contracted, imprisoned, and buried in a living sepulchre, a coarse covering, which is ever changing, which does not continue one moment the same, and is something merely accidental to our substance. The immortal seed, the incorruptible body, the subtle vehicle is at present the seat of the soul, and the channel of communication between the pure spirit and the gross body, the hidden spring of all the motions and operations of our walking carcass"(153).

Ramsay's character Pythagoras is opposed to the ideas of Anaximander, who believes that matter is eternal, eternally active, acts randomly without design, and is all there is (164).

Ramsay: "Hence it is... that the mortal and terrestrial body which is ever changing, and does not continue one moment the same, is something merely accidental to our substance, and does not originally belong to it; a thick crust, a coarse covering cast over the celestial, spiritual, active and glorious body, which being unveiled and enlarged at the resurrection, will appear in all its beauty; that this immortal seed, this incorruptible body, this hidden principle, which is, perhaps, at present the seat of the soul, will, for reasons known to God only, remain buried after death in the common mass of matter, till the last manifestation of divine power; and that then the face of the earth will be renewed by purifying flames, which will purge our globe of all that dark and early dross which it has contracted. And this notion renders the doctrine of the resurrection intelligible and philosophical"(256).
Ramsay agrees with Descartes, Mallebranche, Poirot, Leibnitz, Newton, Bentley, Clarke, and Cheyne that faith is defendable. He disagrees with Hobbes, Behmen and cabalistical writers who "have revived the errors of the Stoics, and pretend that extension is the basis of all substances; that the soul differs from the body only as being more subtilized; that a spirit is but a rarefied body, and a body a condensed spirit; and lastly, that the infinite Being, though indivisible, is extended by local diffusion"(273).

Priestley (L.L.D., F.R.S.) was a prolific writer, producing treatises on electricity, history, grammar, political science, and church authority, among other works. Here, Priestley espouses a Christian materialism that claims the "the proper unity of God . . . and the proper humanity of Christ"(iii). This massive "history of ideas" chronicles metaphysical debates about matter and spirit beginning in antiquity.
Comment: These excerpts set out various views about the properties of spirit and matter. Priestley argued that materialism was "the favorite tenet of rational christians" (xxiii) and that the idea of an immortal and immaterial soul was "the main bulwark of popery" and a corruption introduced from Oriental and Greek Philosophy (195). (See Priestley's History of Discoveries relating to Vision for a "new theory concerning matter" which he greatly admired (the theory was proposed by Father Boscovich and Mr. Michell).) Below are contemporary definitions of spirit and matter. Of note are passages which equate "immaterial substance" with "pure intelligences" and which refer to spirit as "highly rareified" matter. See Priestley's discussions of the nature of the divine essence and of the human soul (pp. 103-108, 215-244) for theology that associates spirit with some sort of material substance.

Excerpt (pages): "Like the generality of christians in the present age, I had always taken it for granted, that man had a soul distinct from his body, though with many modern divines, I supposed it to be incapable of exerting any of its faculties, independently of the body; and I believed this soul to be a substance so intirely distinct from matter, as to have no property in common with it"(v).

"It has generally been supposed that there are two distinct kinds of substance in human nature, and they have been distinguished by the terms matter and spirit. The former of these has been said to be possessed of the property of extension, viz. of length, breadth, and thickness, and also of solidity or impenetrability, but it is said to be naturally destitute of all powers whatever. The latter has of late been defined to be a substance intirely destitute of all extension, or relation to space, so as to have no property in common with matter; and therefore to be properly immaterial, but to be possessed of the powers of perception, intelligence, and self-motion.

"Matter is that kind of substance of which our bodies are composed, whereas the principle of perception and thought belonging to us is said to reside in a spirit, or immaterial principle, intimately united to the body; while the higher orders of intelligent beings, and especially the Divine Being, are said to be purely immaterial"(Introduction i-ii).

[Cartesian hypothesis]: "Essence of mind is thought, and the essence of body extension, exclusive of every property that had before been supposed to be common to them both, and by which they might influence one another."(81). [Real efficient cause of thought and body is the] "immediate agency of the Deity, exerted according to certain rules which he invariably followed"(81).

"It is. . . maintained in this treatise, that the notion of two substances that have no common property, and yet are capable of intimate connection and mutual action, is both absurd and modern; a substance without extension or relation to place being unknown both in the scriptures, and to all antiquity; . . . "(Intro iii). "Indeed, it is evident, that if nothing but immaterial substances, or pure intelligences, had existed, the very idea of place, or space, could not have occurred to us."(76).

[Father Gerdill, defending the immaterial soul, says], "as he is quoted by the author of la vraye Philosophie. . . in order to explain how the soul can have an idea of extension and of space, when itself bears no relation to either, that 'though the soul be incapable of motion, like the body, it doth not fail to contain eminently within itself that quality of matter, and therefore is capable of transferring it upon matter, and of supposing it to belong to matter"(77-78).

"Metaphysicians. . . affirm, that we have as clear an idea of spirit, as we have of matter, each being equally the unknown support of known properties, matter of extension and solidity, and spirit of sensation and thought. But still, since the substance is confessedly unknown to us, it must also be unknown to us what properties it is capable of supporting; and, therefore, unless there be a real inconsistency in the properties themselves, those which have hitherto been ascribed to both substances may belong to either of them"(92-93).

[Confucius reportedly defined angels or spirits as] "air".-"They look upon it to be a material thing, though highly rarefied"(234). "From the whole of this section, and the preceding, it will appear, that the modern idea of an immaterial being is by no means the same thing that was so denominated by the ancients; it being well known to the learned. . . that what the ancients meant by an immaterial being, was only a finer kind of what we should now call matter; something like air or breath, which first supplied a name for the soul, or else like fire or flame, which was probably suggested by the consideration of the warmth of the living body' (263-64).

Pythagoras believed matter "the cause of all evil" (322). Plato also (323). Devil is governor of matter? (390).

God imputes his sin to us, and thus makes it really ours, though not personally; or else that, by a divine judicial constitution, he regards it as ours, though it is not, and holds us liable to punishment for it, independently of and before our own acts; and that, on one of these grounds, as a punishment of that sin, we forfeit his favor, and that accordingly he withdraws from us divine supernatural influences, so that we are born devoid of original righteousness, and, as a necessary result, with natures corrupt and sinful, anterior to choice or action, and leading to actual sin, and deserving of eternal death.

"Others do not retain the doctrine of imputation at all, and yet believe that the ruinous consequences of Adam's sin do come upon us; and that, on account of it, we are born with depraved natures before choice or action, which are properly sinful.

"Others, denying a depraved nature anterior to choice, and holding that all sin is voluntary, ascribe to a stated exercise of divine efficiency the fact that all men sin.

"Others only affirm that our natures have been so changed, in consequence of Adam's fall, that in all the appropriate circumstances of our being in this world we sin as soon as moral agency commences; and, although the mere nature of man before volition cannot be strictly sinful, yet, in a popular sense, it may be called corrupt, depraved, and sinful,--that is, always leading to sin.

"...[A]ll have one idea in common,--that our original guilt and sinfulness were not caused by our own action in another state of being, but by the sin of Adam"(371).

This article begins as a taxonomy of offices in the Baptist church after the New Testament pattern. However, after vaguely deliniating the position of deacon, the text quickly breaks down into rambling advice for everyone in the church. An interesting appendix (not indexed here) explores why women aren't allowed to be "deaconesses" or to "prophecy" as they do in the New Testament.
Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist
Respecting Deacons, the first Christian church existed some time without any. The choice, when made, arose from circumstances, and not from their being essential to the formation of a church . . . The name conveys the idea of a servant. The office in the primitive church included the care of the poor, and attention to secular affairs. Our churches have blended with the office of deacons, that of ruling Elders, without considering the difference between the two, or, once recollecting that man may be qualified for one, and not for the other" (4).

Deacons "'Not a novice,' . . . not one new-planted, or, new-baptized . . . . They 'must be grave' not given to freaks of playful frivolity, nor connivers at those wild frolicks of young people, under their eye, which frequently lead to lasciviousness, and every evil work. They must be men of strict integrity . . . they must be temperate not addicted to excessive indulgence in any thing . . . (5-6).

When accused, two witnesses must be had. Deacons are under the familiar obligations to 1. Love one another; 2. Help each other; 3. Watch over each other; 4. "Adjust among themselves, private differences if possible; and if they fail, to bring them before the church" (10).

An important source for anyone studying the relationship of magic practice and belief in relation to Joseph Smith-- particularly if Quinn is right in suggesting that the book had wide influence and circulation. Perhaps most striking is the strongly Christian worldview underlying The Magus. That is, magic exists within a clearly Christian paradigm, and the text repeatedly links elements of the occult (both good and bad magic) with either God or the Devil. Positive stones or charms are the result of God's administration and governance, while the monstrous spirits that roam the woods are the perverse result of Satan's occult tampering with the apple in the garden of Eden. The presence of Christian and magic belief existing in such close relation seems to support the thesis that Joseph Smith and early Mormon converts would not have been uncomfortable with the language of a magic world view. (Multiple index entries)

This passage tries to work out the implications of an occult fall: that is, Lucifer inserted an occult substance into the apple which incites Adam and Eve to concupiscence. In this reading, the substance of the fall is no more and no less than copulation, which the author considers inherently corrupt, and at best an evil that must be tolerated.

Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):
"Deservedly, therefore, hath the Lord deprived both our parents of the benefit of immortality; namely, death succeeded from a conjugal and brutal copulation; neither remained the spirit of the Lord with man, after that he began to be flesh . . . . because that defilement of Eve shall thenceforth be continued in the propagation of posterity, even unto the end of the world . . . . man being sowed in the pleasure of the concupiscence of the flesh shall therefore always reap a necessary death in the flesh of sin . . . ." (16).

"But, the knowledge of good and evil, which God placed in the dissuaded apple, did contain in it a seminary virtue of the concupiscence of the flesh, that is, an occult forbidden conjunction, diametrically opposite to the state of innocence . . . . For it pleased the Lord of heaven and earth to insert in the apple an incentive to concupiscence; by which he was able safely to abstain, by not eating of the apple, therefore dissuaded therefrom; for otherwise he had never at any time been tempted, or stirred up by his genital members. Therefore the apple being eaten, man, from an occult and natural property ingrafted in the fruit, conceived a lust, and sin became luxurious to him, and from thence was man an animal seed . . . . For if man had not tasted the apple, he had lived a life void of concupiscence, and offsprings had appeared out of Eve (a virgin) from the Holy Spirit" (15-17).

Comment: This small pamphlet offers little in the way of interesting or distinctive doctrine, opting instead for homey, advice based on the New Testament instruction to "love your neighbor." The pamphlet interested me because it presents a situation where a "key" opens the gate of heaven. The implications of the metaphor are never really pursued, however, and the "key to heaven" remains on a highly abstract level-- the "key to heaven" ends up being synonymous with living a good Christian life. The description of heaven (two separate index entries) is also useful inspite of its lack of specificity, providing, as it does, one example of how heaven is conceived during the period.

This interesting passage negotiates the conflict between the tenets of astrology, which acknowledge the influence of the stars and a strong belief in free will. Furthermore, the passage argues that mankind carries within itself a "a complete system," "we carry a heaven in ourselves from our beginning, for God hath sealed in us the image of himself."

Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):
"It is highly necessary that we examine how far [the influence of the stars] extends to man, seeing that I fully admit that man is endowed with a free-will from God, which the stars can in no wise counteract. And as there is in man the power and apprehension of all divination, and wonderful things, seeing that we have a complete system in ourselves, therefore are we called the microcosm, or little world; for we carry a heaven in ourselves from our beginning, for God hath sealed in us the image of himself; and of all created beings we are the epitome, therefore we must be careful, lest we confound and mix one thing with another" (3-4).

"For seeing likewise that the soul is immortal, and endued with free-will, which acts upon the body, the soul cannot be inclined by any configuration of the stars either to good or evil; but form its own immortal power of willingly being seduced by sin, it prompts evil; but enlightened by God, it springs to good, on either principle, according to its tendency, the soul feeds while in this frail body; but what further concerns the soul of man in this, and after this, we shall fully investigate the natural magic of the soul, in which we have fully treated every point of enquiry that has been suggested to us by our own imagination, and by scientific experiments have proved its divine virtue originally sealed therein by the Author of its being" (7-8).

Found in a prominent Presbyterian publication, Wylie explains why the doctrine of universal salvation is unscriptural and illogical.

Comment:
A clear statement of one version of the anti-universalist position. This particular article comes up in Vogel's Religious Seekers and the Advent of Mormonism. Vogel states: "The orthodox in Joseph Smith's day liked to quote from the New Testament about the "unpardonable sin" (Matt. 12: 31-32; Mk. 3: 29; Lk. 12: 10) in refuting universalists" (76). And, indeed, this is one of the primary supports for the argument that God cannot save everyone-- it would contradict what he has said about unforgivable sins in the New Testament. The piece later moves toward the Calvinist assertion that God has given Christ only a certain number of souls to save. Interesting how the logical tone and argumentative patterns of this article differ from Hosea Ballou's style of argumentation (Ballou's style much more closely resembles Joseph Smith's style than this writing does).

"But the question is, was it designed for all, or only for some of the rebels against Jehovah?" (122).

1. "That the persons for whom Jesus laid down his life, are a selection from among men, is evident from the epithets and names by which they are designated . . . . they are called Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God-- Redeemed from among men-- Few, when compared with the great mass of mankind; many are called but few are chosen" (123).

"2. From the limitation of Jesus' intercession. . . . the propitiation is exactly commensurate with the extent of the Father's donation for this purpose 'All those whom the Father has given unto me, shall come unto me; and in him that cometh unto me, will I in Nowise cast out'" (123).

"The intercessions of both our Lord and of his followers, have their limitations. There is an unpardonable sin, for which pararyer would be altogether useless; and that for this plain reason, it is declared to be irremissible. Our Lord has declared its so. It is the sin against he Holy Ghost. Now it is clear, if this sin be unpardonable, the person guilty of it must for ever be under the ban of vindicatory justice, and consequently his punishment must be eternal" (123).

3. "If the foregoing argument be admitted to be conclusive, it must plainly follow that the doctrine of a universal atonement involves the impeachment of the divine wisdom by which Jesus declares the sin against the Holy Ghost to be unpardonable, never to be forgiven, either in this world, or in the world to come" (123).

4. "The particularity of the atonement is evidenced by the restriction of the means of its application to sinners. John xvii.3. It is expressly declared, "This is life eternal, that they know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou has sent;" which clearly implies, that not to know Jesus Christ, or, ignorance of him, is the opposite, viz. Eternal death. 'Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of god. But how shall they believe on him of whom they have not heard?' . . . . it presents no consolation to the heathen, living and dying destitute of the knowledge of Christ Jesus. It pronounces them to be "without God, and without hope in the world.' Such is the mysterious, yet equitable constitution, established by God, who doth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and also among the inhabitants of earth, and is obliged to give an account of none of his matters" (124).

Ostensibly a discourse on the minister and his internal call, this pamphlet rapidly deteriorates into a plea for money. The author argues extensively that ministers need to be paid for their work. The first few pages, however, sketch out the internal nature of a minister's call.

Excerpt (pages):

"The interesting, important question which I wish to answer is, Who are called of God to preach?" (3). "Here let it be observed, that God deals variously with different persons who are called to preach the gospel; as to the means used, and many circumstances relating thereto; as really, as in the conversion of souls to himself by gospel grace; so that no man can lay out an exact method, and determine that every soul who is truly called of God to preach, must be led exactly in that particular path: yet as to the nature and essence of the call it always amounts to the same thing! God has not, indeed, limited the efficacy of ordinances, by the characters of those who administer them" (4). However, a preacher must have the qualifications of Barnabas: must be a good man, full of the Holy Ghost, and of Faith (Acts 11: 24). "In his private refreshments he gives up himself to the word of God and to prayer" (4). "Also full of the holy ghost; which in this place is supposed to signify, his indwelling, and ordinary operations, or what is elsewhere called an unction from the holy one, 1 Jeh. 2, 20 . . . .
As no man took on him the honours of priesthood under the law, but he that was called of God, as was Aaron: so no man, however great and good his abilities, ought to engage in the gospel ministry, who has not a divine call to it. This call contains a discovery of the present state of God's people;-- The treasure of the gospel's being opened and committed to the soul-- and God's command therewith, to go and feed his sheep and with such clearness as to answer all objections; and sweetly and powerfully to constrain the person to go into that great work" (6).

Comment:

As in other sources of this type, this document demonstrates an interesting dual notion of keys: Richard Mather-- and the sources he cites-- know that "keys" exist and that they relate to government, but there is no explicit definition of what the keys actually are or can do. As Dr. Fulk states, "The Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, whatsoever they are, be committed to the whole Church, & not to one Person only . . ." (My Italics, 22). This passage highlights two things: the self-acknowledged unsurety about what exactly keys are; and the tendency to relate "keys" to the Catholic practice of the Pope's pardon. The upshot is that while the terminology "keys of the kingdom" circulates in American religious culture, Joseph's version of the theology of "keys" doesn't seem to come directly from that culture.

Excerpt (pages):

"Question I. Whether does the Power of Church Government belong to all the People, or to the Elders alone?"

Answer:
Take Government, not Generally for all Power, Privilege, or Interest, but strictly and properly for Authority and Rule, & then the Answer is, That as all Soveraign & Supreme Power of Government belongs only to Christ, who therefore is said (Isai. 9: 6) to have the Government upon his Shoulders; so Ministerial and delegated Government, belongeth only to the Elders" (9).

"The Sum is this much: elders are Rulers and Governours, therefore in Propriety of Speech, they are not Servants. Elders by a Metaphor are Servants to the People; but this neither giveth Government to the People, nor takes away the Government of the Elders. If it be said, That many good Divines hold the Church Government to be of a mixt form; in respect of Christs Monarchical; in respect of the Elders Aristocratical, and in respect of the People Democratical; and therefore the people have some Share in the Government"(17).

Comment:

The relation of the details of the case is intricate and not too useful, but the source does approach some interesting issues of church government. Cotton's position is similar to his view in "the Keyes of the Kingdome," that is, the keys are vested in the congregation, but the elders are the ones who have exclusive right to exercise them. Interestingly, however, the phrase "keys" is never used in the relation of this dispute, even though issues of church governance are at stake.

Excerpt (pages):

"Before I enter upon the Narrative, it will be proper to recite the Words of the Platform of Church Discipline, and the Law of the Province, as the Foundation of what follows. Platform, Chap. 8. Sect. 5, 7, 9. 'Officers are to be called by such Churches, whereunto they are to minister.-- Of such Moment is the Preservation of this Power, that the Churches exercised it in the Presence of the Apostles, Acts 14. 23 and 1.23 and 6. 3, 4, 5.-
- And if the church have Power to choose their Officers and Ministers, then in Case of manifest Unworthiness and Delinquency, they have power to depose them:--- For to open and shut, to choose and refuse, to constitute in Office, and remove from Office, are Acts belonging to the same Power.-- The Choice of such Church Officers belongeth not to the civil Magistrates, as such, or diocesan Bishops, or Patrons; for of these, or any such like,* the scripture is wholly silent, as having any power therein” (9)
* "The Clause refers to the Congregation directly, or by Parity of Reason; the same Reason excluding them that excludes the others, viz. Want of divine Right:--- And indeed the Platform gives the Congregation no Power or Privilege from the Beginning to the End of it" (10).
A letter from another precinct, responding to a request for advice:
"Altho' we apprehend it to be the Privilege of a Church to introduce a Candidate for the Ministry into the Pulpit; yet inasmuch as the Inhabitants of the first Precinct in Middleboro' have the Power of the Meeting-House, having the Key in the Possession; we advise the Brethren of the Church to get a Candidate to preach to them on Probation, and in case the Inhabitants get a Person to preach to them at the same Time, we advise the Church to hear their Minister, one Part of the Day, if the Inhabitants will hear their's the other; and when the Church have heard so long as to be ripe for a Choice, to assemble together, and come to the Choice of a Minster according to Law in that Case made and provided.
Nathaniel Leonard, Mod." (11).
The opposition:
"We humbly intreat you to be tender (and we hope you will) of the Privileges of Christ's Church, and not do any Thing interfering therewith; as we apprehend it will be, if you set up a small Number of our Brethren as the Church.-- Will not this be in Effect to unchurch and excommunicate all the Rest?-- Will not this be to say, we have forfeited our Right to all Church Privileges?-- For if we have no Right to vote, we have none to partake, &c-- "(28).
"If any should say, that tho' we have not unchurch'd our selves; yet a Council has Authority to do it, and give a few Members the Name of the Church.-- We answer, We can't find that Christ has given any such Authority to Councils: To be sure our Constitution knows nothing of it; for the Method the platform prescribes, even where a Church is really corrupt, and a Number of Members are dissatisfy'd, is, for other Churches to withdraw Communion from that Church . . ." (29).
There has been wrong on both sides, but "I am firmly perswaded . . . that the Church have in the main a just Cause, supported by Scripture and Reason, and agreeable to the Sentiments of our Fore-fathers, and the Constitution of these Churches, as well as the Law of the Province.-- To make which evident, is the Scope of what follows in this Essay" (30).
Increase Mather weighs in on the debate (via an old pamphlet):
"We ought not to make Distinctions, where the Rule makes none; and separate Things which have a close connexion; and set up two Powers, where one only is spoken of--
The same Reason that proves, that 'tis the Church's Right to choose, proves that 'tis their Right to nominate" (33).

Excerpt (pages):

The subject is that of the "Church-power, which Christ hath left on earth; how bounded, & to whom committed" (1).

"In those former darker times, this golden Ball was throwne up by the Clergy (so called) alone to runne for among themselves: And as they quietly possessed the name [Greek characters], the Clergy of the Church, appropriated to themselves; so answerably all manner of interest in power or cognisance of matters of the church, was wholly left and quitted to them . . . This Royall donation bestowed by Christ upon his Church, was taken up and placed in so high thrones of Bishops, Popes, Generall Councells, &c." (2).

"The Saints (in these knowing times) finding that the Key of knowledge hath so farre opened their hearts, that they see with their owne eyes into the substantials of Godlinessse, and that through the instruction and guidance of their teachers, they are enabled to understand for themselves such other things as they are to joy in the practice of. They doe therefore further (many of them) begin more then to suspect, that some share in the Key of power should likewise appertain unto them" (2).

Later in Church history, "those who first in these latter times revived this plea of the peoples right [erred] to the other extreame . . . by laying the plea and claim on their behalf unto the whole power; & that the Elders set over them did but exercise that power for them, which was properly theirs, and which Christ had (as they contended radically and originally estated in the people only" (3).

Hopefully, though, "the finall judgment and sentence may (possibly) fall to be a suitable & due proportioned distribution & dispersion of this power into severall interests, and the whole to neither part. In Commonwealths, it is a Dispersion of severall portions of power and rights into several hands . . . which causeth that healthfull [greek characters]; and constitution of them, which makes them lasting and preserves their peace" (3).

In general, Christ "layes this fundamentall Maxime . . . That look whatever power or right any of the Possessours and subjects thereof may have, they have it each, alike immediately (that is, in respect of a mediation of delegation or dependence on each other) from Christ & so are each, the first subjects of that power that is allotted to them. And for the particular subjects themselves, hee follows that division (in the handling of them) which the controversie itself hath made unto his hands; to wit, 1. What power each single Congregation (which is indowed wiht a Charter to be a body-politique to Christ) hath granted to it to exercise within itself: And 2. What measure, or rather, kinde of Power Christ hath placed in Neighbour-Churches without it, & in association with it" (4-5).

1. "For the first. As hee supposeth, each Congregation, such, as to have the priviledge of injoying a Presbyterie, or company of more or lesse Elders proper unto itself; so being thus Presbyterated hee asserteth this incorporate body or society to be the first and primary subject of a compleat and entire power within itself over its own members; yea, and the sole native subject of the power of Ordination & Excommunication, which is the highest Censure . . ." (5).

2. And because these particular Congregations, both Elders and People, may disagree & miscarry and abuse this power committed to them; He, therefore, Secondly, asserteth an association or communion of Churches . . ." (6).

Nature of Source:
Tuckerman is perhaps best known as a social reformer, Tuckerman is an early example of what would later come to be known as Unitarianism. This pamphlet, however, is interesting more for its doctrinal content on the call of minister. Tuckerman suggests that, unlike the apostles in Christ's day, contemporary ministers have a much less direct claim to a divine ordination and licence.

Library Location: 080 sh64a no. 49644

Comment:
This is an interesting sermon because Tuckerman clearly sees a difference between the apostles operating under the direct temporal and (later) spiritual direction of the Savior and the contemporary Christian minister. Basically states that while the actual ordination is "solemn" and useful for both the congregation and the minister, that it is theologically meaningless.

Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):
"An ambassador is the representative of his sovereign. . . . The Apostles, immediately commissioned by our lord, and invested by him with peculiar powers, were peculiarly, Christ with men. They were his representatives. They executed his will. . . . it is their peculiar language, we pray you, in Christ's stead. On christian minsters also, who have entered into the labours of the Apostles, devolve the solemn duties of ambassadors for Christ. Our office, therefore, includes all that is most intersting and important, which may be attempted for human improvement and happiness; all that concerns manas an accountable, immortal being." (3).
However, "We enter upon the ministry, not indeed as Apostles, peculiarly designated to the office, but from choice of the service; from zealous attachment to his cause; from humble and pure desires to be dispensers of his word, and labourers together with him for the salvation of man . . . . Between ourselves, and the first ambassadors of our Lord, there is indeed the difference,— never to be forgotten,— that under the immediate and supernatural guidance of him by whom they were commissioned, in doctrine and in precept they could not err" (4).
Although, he does suggest that ministers are "by the most solemn acts are consecrated to God and to Christ . . . ." (5).
Every person is free to choose who he will worship (6).
"We believe that God has entrusted His word to all who have received it; and that, as it is the duty of every one to examine for himself, ever one has equally a right, according to the light that God shall give him, to interpret the Scriptures for himself. In preaching His word, therefore, and in the servies of our office, the only influence we may ask, or that should be granted to us, is that which all, of unprejudiced and honest minds, will admit should be given to truth" (7).
"It is altogether a voluntary relation into which we enter with the people of our charge. The minster of a society is chosen by, and not imposed upon the society to which he ministers" (20).
"We would not unduly magnify our office. But we are not qualified for this office, if we do not feel the greatness of its interests, and the importance of its duties. Nor could I attempt to illustrate the influence of a faithful minister of Christ, without showing also the importance of his services" (21).
"Does any one say to us, show us your credentials, before you address us as an ambassador for Christ? Show us the validity of your ordination? We reply that, we have no desire of an imposing name. We claim no authority over any man's conscience. We assert no dominion over your faith or conduct, but that which we can obtain by strength of argument, and the power of persuasion . . . . Nor do we pretend that we confer any new powers by the acts of ordination. We do but acknowledge, and, by authority given to us by the church in whose name we act, confirm the powers and rights, and privileges, to the acceptance and exercise of which he who is to be ordained is invited by those, with whom he is to be immediately connected as their minister . . . . These rites of our churches are derived from Apostolic usage; and we adopt them, because they are most solemn, most appropriate, and as we believe, most conformed to the order and design of the gospel If they do not make him whom we thus ordain holy to the Lord, they make him and others, if they have the sensibility of christians, feel that his character and his labours should be holy" (30).

Nature of Source: A journal-length article which traces the evolution of the office of Bishop from the inception of the church, through to the present day-- although most of the emphasis falls on the period between 1831 and 1900.
Comment: This article emphasizes the internal development of the office of Bishop and yields little insight into the larger culture's idea of a bishop. The information cited below, however is a useful bit of hard-to-find insight into the early saint's perceptions of the office of bishop.
Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist
Excerpt (pages): In February 1831, Edward Partridge was called to be the first bishop in the newly formed church. "Before that time, the Church's structure consisted of elders, priests, teachers, and deacons. No one, including Joseph Smith had any prior notion that the organization would include the office of bishop. Even ten months later, when Newel K. Whitney was also called to the office, "he did not know at the time nor Joseph either what the position of a bishop was. Thought like Catholics and Episcopalians a Bishop was the highest office in the church" (103).

Comment:
An important source for anyone studying the relationship of magic practice and belief in relation to Joseph Smith-- particularly if Quinn is right in suggesting that the book had wide influence and circulation. Perhaps most striking is the strongly Christian world view underlying The Magus. That is, magic exists within a clearly Christian paradigm, and the text repeatedly links elements of the occult (both good and bad magic) with either God or the Devil. Positive stones or charms are the result of God's administration and governance, while the monstrous spirits that roam the woods are the perverse result of Satan's occult tampering with the apple in the garden of Eden. The presence of Christian and magic belief existing in such close relation seems to support the thesis that Joseph Smith and early Mormon converts would not have been uncomfortable with the language of a magic world view. This passage uses language which resembles that which appears in the Book of Mormon regarding the use of wealth and treasure. It speaks of wealth, used improperly, makes him a "slave," an "immediate instrument to the Prince of this World and the Powers of Darkness."
Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist
Excerpt (pages):
"Most men prevent their own happiness; they destroy it, by suffering themselves to be governed by the outward principle of the flesh, thinking the greatest good to be in the satisfying of their carnal appetites, or in the amassing together heaps of wealth, whereby they thrust down the meek and poor, raising up the standards of Pride, Envy, and Oppression. These things every day's experience confirms; nay, there are some so blind, that, in the possession of much wealth, they think there is nothing beyond it; insomuch, that they triumph in lust, oppression, revenge, and contumely. But how is it thou wilt say, that, seeing man is a reasonable being, he can possibly give up his government so easily?—I say, when man suffers the unreasonable and bestial part to deprave him, then he immediately becomes a slave, (and the vilest of slavery is that which deprives man of his social virtues;) for then, although in the possession of great worldly things, such as houses, estates, and all other temporal gifts, yet he becomes an immediate instrument to the Prince of this World and the Powers of Darkness, seeing that those riches he inherits are merely given him in this life, to bestow upon others those necessaries and comforts which he himself does not feel the want of, and by which he might, if not blinded by his passions and lusts, secure himself an eternal and incorruptible treasure. But he who possesses treasures without mercy, liberality, bounty, charity, &c. robs the Eternal Author of all good, of the honor due unto him, and, in short, is working destruction to his own soul; his riches, instead of benefitting himself and others, eventually and finally terminates as a curse: while he lives here he is a scourge to society; and, after he leaves this, it is plain enough pointed out in the New Testament what will be his situation and condition" (53-54).

This passage suggests that after the fall, God saw fit to reveal to Adam the preparation of a savior. Even the language of the passage is interesting: man could never "hope to return to the brightness of his ancient purity by his own strength," could not "reprieve his posterity from death" and that God had decided to "satisfy his justice at the fulness of times" in order to "elevate mankind to a more sublime and eminent state of blessedness."

Adam realizes that Abe's murder was an inevitable outgrowth of his concupiscence. He decides to refrain for 100 years:

"But the repentance of one age being finished, it is most probable the mystery of Christ's incarnation was revealed to him; neither that man ever could hope to return to the brightness of his ancient purity by his own strength, and much less that himself could reprieve his posterity from death; and that, therefore, marriage was well pleasing, and was after the fall indulged unto him by God because he had determined thus to satisfy his justice at the fulness of times, which should, to the glory of his own name, and the confusion of Satan, elevate mankind to a more sublime and eminent state of blessedness. From that time Adam began to know his wife . . ." (19).

A very interesting account; of particular interest are her general tone and her visionary experiences. First, the style in which she relates her life story resembles Joseph Smith's method of relating his life (in the 1838 First Vision account). Second, her vision of the path, the river, and the multitude bear a close resemblance to Lehi's dream in the Book of Mormon. Finally, the frame of the story is the similar: an angelic companion carries his charge about, showing symbolic scenes and then interpreting them for the visionary.

"I now saw that I had grieved the Spirit of God, and had never repented of my sins as I ought, and turned to the Lord with full purpose of heart; but had been adding sin unto sin, and treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath. At this time my sins were set in order before me, and sunk me in the depths of misery." (6).

"One night, as I retired to pray, I had a most shining view of the justice and holiness of God-- of the purity of his nature and character, and of my own criminality . . . . While I was on my knees before god, my Saviour spake peace to me . . . . At this there was a strange alteration in my mind: my burden left me; and the view I had of what Christ suffered for sinners, filled me with wonder and surprise" (7).

Page 18 contains a description of the "evil spirits" whose "persuasions and success were surprising, as well as painful to me" (18).

"But one thing, which was truly distressing and trying to me, and which appeared very strange, was, that I found nothing in the records of the followers of Christ about their being sprinkled; but, on the contrary, found many places, of their being baptized by immersion, on going into the water" (8).

More like "A Key to Hell," This pamphlet was extracted from Boston's book, Human Nature in its Fourfold State. In this thoroughly entertaining essay, Boston expounds upon the miseries of eternal damnation. He lays out the ways in which punishment is eternal, the reasons souls in hell with suffer, and in exactly what manner they will suffer. Of interest is the fact that although Boston died in 1732, this pamphlet was actually published in 1796.
Comment:
Hoping to find some notion of "keys" appearing in this essay, I ended up finding a solid dozen of thought on the nature of the afterlife. What is particularly interesting to students of LDS theology is the recognition that these well-developed notions of hell were still receiving some circulation in Joseph's era. This piece would bear re-reading by someone interested in notions of hell, punishment, justice, etc. Unfortunately, the only thing this does for a student of "keys" is to reinforce the use of the word interchangeably with "cipher" or "code-breaker."

"Seeing, in the other world, there is a prison for the wicked, as well as a palace for the saints, we must enquire into that state of everlasting misery; the which the worst of men may well bear with, without crying, Art though come to torment us before the time?" (5).
Punishment is "two-fold, the punishment of Loss, in separation from GOD and CHRIST, Depart from me; and the punishment of Sense, in most exquisite and extreme torment, Depart from me into fire" (6).
"I. As to the curse under which the damned shall be shut up in hell; it is the terrible sentence of the law, by which they are bound over to the wrath of God, as transgressors . .
. .By nature all men are under the curse; but it is removed from the elect, by virtue of their union with CHRIST. It abides on the rest of sinful mankind; and by it they are devoted to destruction, separated to evil, as one may describe the curse, from Deut. xxix.
21. And the Lord shall separate him unto evil. Thus shall the damned, for ever, be persons devoted to destruction; separate and set apart, from among the rest of mankind, unto evil, as vessels of wrath, set up for marks to the arrows of divine wrath; and made the common receptacle and whore of vengeance.
This curse hath its first fruits on earth, which are a pledge of the whole [lump?] that is to follow. And hence it is, that as temporal and eternal benefits are bound up together" (7).
"They will remember, that time was, when they might have been made partakers of the blessed state of the saints, in their enjoyment of God: and this will aggravate their sense of the loss. All may remember, there was once a possibility of it; that sometime they were in the world, some corners of which, the way of salvation was laid open to men's view; and may wish they had gone round the world, till they had found it out. Despisers of the gospel will remember with bitterness, that JESUS CHRIST, with all his benefits, was offered to them; that they were exhorted, intreated and pressed to accept, but would not . . ." (14).

"Now, consequently, we must discourse of intelligences, spirits, and angels. An intelligence is an intelligible substance, free from all gross and putrifying mass of a body, immortal, insensible, assisting all, having influence over all; and the nature of all intelligences, spirits, and angels is the same . . . . The first of which we call super-celestial, and minds altogether separated from a body, and, as it were, intellectual spheres worshiping one only God, as it were, their most firm and stable unity or centre. Wherefore they even call them Gods, by reason of a certain participation of the Divinity, for they are always full of God . . . . The celestial intelligences do next follow these in the second order, which they call worldly angels, viz. being appointed, besides the divine worship for the spheres of the world, and for the government of every heaven and star; whence they are divided into so many orders as there are heavens in the world, and as there are stars in the heavens . . . A fascinating source-- although not too useful for students of Mormonism. Gavin's work claims to be an expose of Popery's five secrets: Auricular Confession, the Pope's indulgences, account of masses, inquisitors, and prayers, adoration of images, etc. The document starts, however, with a parade of supposedly authentic "auricular confessions" which detail amazingly sordid lives of crime. Many of the people who confess are clergy: priests, nuns, etc, or else the confessions themselves reveal the sins of other clergy.

According to Michael Quinn, the "Key of Solomon"-- a source and instruction book on magic-- is a medieval text which was widely circulated in manuscript form and contributed to the popularity of Cabalistic and ceremonial magic. As the editor notes, however, the manuscript was difficult to get a hold of, at least by 1915. Also of note from the 1915 translation which I looked at is the complicated transcription history of the document. de Laurence notes dozens of manuscripts which he consulted in piecing together the final translated version.

In spite of the difficulties of tracing a direct link between these rare documents and Joseph Smith, the document remains of some interest to LDS scholars. For instance, some of the most interesting segments of "Greater Key" are the introductory narratives which appear to be more modern than the rest of the document-- or at least appear to have been tampered with by translators. These introductions seem resemble the storytelling style and tone of similar instructional tales in Masonry. The introductions also contain compelling speculation about the nature of man and the relation of the Christian and the Occult. While not as ancient, these passages suggest how magic began to be used by a culture that embraced both Christian and Magic cultures.

This passage is interesting because it presents a type: the humble, trustworthy servant who inquires of the Lord about his own ignorance. The Lord, through an angel, requires a promise of his servant and, after the promise is made, allows him to read the key to power.

Excerpt (pages):

Babylonian philosophers come to Solomon's tomb:
"... and when the Sepulchre was dug out and repaired the Ivory Casket was discovered, and therein was the Key of Secrets, which they took with joyful mind, and when they had opened it none among them could understand it on account of the obscurity of the words and their Occult arrangement, and the hidden character of the sense and knowledge, for they were not worthy to possess this treasure.

Then, therefore, arose one among them, more worthy (than the others), both in the sight of the gods, and by reason of his age, who was called Iohé Grevis, and said unto the others: Unless we shall come and ask the interpretation from the Lord, with tears and entreaties, we shall never arrive at the knowledge of it" (2).

An angel appears to Iohé and tells him: "Do thou remember if the secrets of SOLOMON appear hidden and obscure unto thee, that the Lord hath wished it, so that such wisdom may not fall into the hands of wicked men; wherefore do thou promise unto me, that thou art not willing that so great wisdom should ever come to any living creature, and that which thou revealest unto any let them know that they must keep it unto themselves, otherwise the secrets are profaned and no effect can follow?'

And Iohé answered: I promise unto thee that to none will I reveal (them), save to the honour of the Lord, and with much discipline, unto peninent [sic], secret, and faithful (persons) (2).

Following this instruction Iohé is allowed to read the Key and then returns it to its ivory casket.

The famous anti-masonry tract that resulted in the death of William Morgan and the subsequent vilification of masons in America. This particular document is an 1882 reprint of the original which was published in 1828. It is important to note that this version and the earlier versions ([1828] and 1830, for instance) differ significantly. It appears that the second half was added, or added to, although it also seems to be an accurate representation of the higher levels of Masonry. It would be interesting to do a close comparison of the 1830 version and the 1882 version. Two parts are present in the version: the first, actually written by Morgan himself, resembles the earlier versions. The second, written by an anonymous "Member of the Craft," details the higher levels of masonry.

Comment:

Obviously, this work is filled with material of interest to researchers interested in many aspects of Mormonism and its origins. Of particular interest, however are the ways in which the idea of "keys" appears in this text. The first section of this document contains material related to the ancientness of the masonic order, the usage of pass-words, tokens, etc., and the idea of a "key" as a hint or a special bit of information that allows access to other, higher knowledge.

The passages cited here detail some of the uses of keys during the higher levels of Masonry.

Mark-Master Masons: "The master approaches the front of this little Temple, which faces the east, and opens a small golden door, when a transparent, view is had within, of the Sanctum Sanctorum or Holy of Holies. Immediately above (yet within the Temple), are two golden Cherubims, supporting between them a Key Stone, with a circle of eight letters on it, which will be explained hereafter" (86).
"Wherefore, Brethren, lay aside all malice, and guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings. If so be, ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious, to whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men but chosen of God and precious; ye also, as living stones, be ye built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up sacrifices acceptable to God. Wherefore, also, it is contained in the Scriptures, Behold, I lay in Zion, for a foundation, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth shall not make haste to pass it over. Unto you, therefore, which believe, it is an honor; and even to them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner Brethren, this is the will of God, that with well doing you put to silence the ignorance of foolish men" (86).
"Having gone through with these ceremonies, the Brethren all standing in a circle around the Temple, the Master proceeds to his station, and holds up to the view of the Brethren, a Key Stone, with he above initials [T. W. S. T. K. S.] on it,-- and repeats, 'He That Was Slain Soars To Kindred Spirits. This has allusion to the ancient Grand Master, Hiram, whose fatal catastrophe is explained in the Third Degree. The origin of this Key Stone with these initials on it, is very curious, and will be explained in its proper place" (87).
"Master. You are now about to be invested with Secrets, intrusted only in the faithful breasts of Mark-Masters throughout the Globe; and which will entitle you to, and insure their respect and esteem, wheresoever dispersed around the known world. The illuminated Temple before you, is a perfect miniature of King Solomon's at Jerusalem, the Holy City; the Key Stone, supported by the Cherubims with expanded wings, is the main support in all arches, built by operative Masons: with us, as Mark-Masters, it is emblematical of the Binding Link of Brotherly Love, which unites, in one strong Chain, all who have attained to this Honorary Degree. This Stone, my Brother, is also typical of the Stone which was rejected by the builders of old, and in modern days, which stone is Truth. Truth is the Stone which unworthy builders reject, and which is to become the 'head of the Corner.' 'He that hath an ear to hear let him hear.' 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the Hidden Mana, and will give him a White Stone, and in the Stone a new name written, which no man knoweth save him that receiveth it'" (90).
"I might swell out the pages, by giving the Lectures of the several degrees, but as they are merely explanatory of the ceremonies here related, and of certain circumstances connected with the building of King Solomon's Temple, I shall only make this work what it purports to be, a 'KEY,' &c wherewith may be unlocked the door of the Masonic Temple, through which any one may enter who will follow the rules here laid down" (95).
The highest order of masonry:
The High Priest, King, and Scribe now descend from their several stations, and approach a New Temple which is placed on the middle of the floor, and about four times the size of the one used in he Mark, and M. E. Master's degrees" (112).
"During the time the Candidate is in preparation, the companions within the Chapter prepare the room for his reception in a manner which will be seen after his introduction. All things being in readiness, he is taken in by the three companions, then the first thing that meets his eye is a large Arch situated directly over the temple, and reaching nearly to the ceiling. (This arch is composed of several pieces, which are kept in a large chest under lock and key, that they may not be seen by Brethren of a lower degree; and when used in the Chapter are fastened together with crewels.) In the center of this arch, I. E. Where the key stone is usually placed, it is discovered that the key stone is gone, and consequently the arch meets together in such a manner as to make it irregular. The Candidate is then, by means of a ladder of seven rounds, conducted up to the center of the arch, which is opened, and he is placed in the opening instead of the key stone, with his face fronting the East, and his arms extended along over the arch in opposite directions" (113-114).

"At the final climactic moment of the highest order, Hiram Abbiff's body is found: On examining the apartment, a box was found of pure gold, firmly locked, with the key-hole in the exact form of the letter G, and on the top was engraved 'Hiram Abbiff-- Sacred.' The Brethren immediately recollected that a key in the form of the letter G had been preserved in the archives of the Lodge from time immemorial, and none of them had known the use of it; and on calling to their Brethren above, it was thrown down to them, when they easily unlocked their treasure, and to their great joy found the long lost scroll, containing the sacred words: and before ascending they agreed that the Grand hailing sign of this degree, should thereafter be the one made by the Brother who had received the injury; and should only by given when life was in danger; nor then unless there was a prospect that it might thereby be preserved" (121).

"I have to further inform you, Companion, that the key of this golden tabernacle, which was in the form of the letter G, our Grand Master, Hiram Abbiff, ever carried in a pocket near his left breast-- and near his heart. Thus he carried it, when he was slain by the ruffians, and falling on his left side, it made the faint impression which was discovered on that part of his body after it was found. After the ruffians had slain him, they searched his body, and took from his pocket this key; but not knowing the use of it, they threw it among the clefts of the rocks at the time they were detected and taken, where it was found a short time after by some Master-Masons who were examining the spot-- who also not knowing the use of it, it was laid up in the archives of the Lodge by order of King Solomon, where it had remained useless until the period when the discovery was accidentally made which I have just related to you" (122).

Excerpt:
During the stage of the Master-Mason, the murder of Hiram Abiff (the founder of masonry) is re-enacted:
"The master then orders fifteen Fellow-Crafts to be selected from the bands of the workmen, and sent three East, three West, three North, three South, and three in and about the temple in search of their grand Master, Hiram Abiff (in some Lodges they only send twelve, when their own lectures say fifteen, were sent) and charges them if they find the body to examine carefully on and about it for the master's word, or a key to it" (63).

The three that traveled a westerly course return and report that they had found the body, but had discovered "nothing but a faint resemblance of the letter G on the left breast. The Master, on the receipt of this information (raising himself), raises his hands three several times above his head, [as hereinbefore described], and exclaims, 'Nothing but a faint resemblance of the letter G! That is not the Master's word, nor a key to it. I fear the Master's word is forever lost! Nothing but a faint resemblance of the letter G! That is not the Master's word, nor a key to it. Another source on Masonry, useful for correlating observations gleaned from other sources. There are a few things that were new to me here. Each oath not to disclose the signs and tokens is printed in detail, including the penalties for disobedience. We also get another version of the Hiram Abish story, linking Hiram's death explicitly with keywords and the "grand sign" of the master mason.

Hiram is killed, and his three murders are executed:
"King Solomon sent for the twelve Crafts, and desired them to take the body of Hiram up, in order that it might be interred in a solemn manner in the Sanctum Sanctorum; he also told them, that if they could not find a key-word about him, it was lost; for there were only three in the world to whom it was known; and unless they were present, it could not be delivered. Hiram being dead, it consequently was lost. However, as Solomon ordered, they went and cleared the rubbish, and found their Master in a mangled condition, having lain fifteen days; upon which they lifted up their hands above their heads in astonishment, and said, O Lord, my God! This being the first word and sign, King Solomon adopted it as the grand sign of a Master-Mason, and it is used to this day in all lodges of Masters" (35).

Nature of Source:
According to Michael Quinn, the "Key of Solomon"-- a source and instruction book on magic-- is a medieval text which was widely circulated in manuscript form during the 18th and 19th centuries and which contributed to the popularity of Cabalistic and ceremonial magic. As the editor notes, however, the manuscript was difficult to get a hold of, at least by 1915. Also of note from the 1915 translation which I looked at is the complicated transcription history of the document. de Laurence notes dozens of manuscripts which he consulted in piecing together the final translated version.
Comment:
In spite of the difficulties of tracing a direct link between these rare documents and Joseph Smith, the document remains of some interest to LDS scholars. For instance, some of the most interesting segments of "Greater Key" are the introductory narratives which appear to be more modern than the rest of the document-- or at least appear to have been tampered with by translators. These introductions seem resemble the storytelling style and tone of similar instructional tales in Masonry. The introductions also contain compelling speculation about the nature of man and the relation of the Christian and the Occult. While not as ancient, these passages suggest how magic began to be used by a culture that embraced both Christian and Magic cultures.

"And when I comprehended the speech which was made unto me, I understood that in me was the knowledge of all creatures, both things which are in the heavens and things which are beneath the heavens; and I saw that all the writings and wisdom of this present age were vain and futile, I heareth the secret of secrets, in which I have preserved them hidden, and I have also therein concealed all secrets whatsoever of magical arts of any masters; any secret or experiments, namely, of these sciences which is in any way worth being accomplished. Also I have written them in this "Key," so that like as a key openeth a treasure-house, so this Key alone may open the knowledge and understanding of magical arts and sciences . . . .

Therefore, O my son Roboam, I command thee by the blessing which thou expectest from thy father, that thou shall make an Ivory Casket, and therein place, keep, and hide this my "Key"; and when I shall have passed away unto my fathers, I entreat thee to place the same in my Sepulchre beside me, lest at another time it might fall into the hands of the wicked. And as SOLOMON commanded, so it was done" (1-2).

Book I, Chapter I:
"SOLOMON, THE SON OF DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL, hath said that the beginning of our Key is to fear God, to adore Him, to honour Him with contrition of heart, to invoke Him in all matters which we wish to understand . . . . " (9).

A collection of three different discourses, edited by David Austin. The first is a discourse by Dr. Bellamy on the relationship of the church to the last days; the second, an address by Jonathan Edwards, "An humble attempt to promote explicit agreement and visible union of God's people in extraordinary prayer, for the revival of religion and the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth, pursuant to Scripture-promises and prophecies concerning the last time;" and finally, an address by Austin himself, explaining "A Key to the providence of God, in the political operations of 1793-94" (v-viii).

Comment:
This document is an extensive treatment of the millennium and would bear another reading by someone interested in views of the millennium. Edward's segment provides a detailed analysis of the prophecies available concerning the end-time. Austin's discourse assesses the current state of prophecy fulfillment and gauge what further prophecies need to be fulfilled. The word "key" does come up, but only in the sense of cipher or means of interpreting something-- in this case, in the sense of a interpretive method for looking at apocalyptic revelation (i.e. Austin's "key" is simply his own preferred allegorical reading of certain passages, which, when accepted, lead to certain logical conclusions.

But as a key to this chapter, I would humbly, and in the fear of God, presume to say, that, under the character of the woman and her sorrows, we have exhibited the state and strugglings of the true church of Christ, in every age of the world, in which she hath, or may be called to suffer, from the Christian era until the consummation of all things . . . . This foundation being laid as a key to the chapter, may we not proceed, and say, that the woman denotes the state of the church in its first institution?" (409-411).

In the body of the pamphlet, John Cotton attempts to clearly position the elders of the Puritan church in relation to the congregation. Particularly interesting since this is actually an 1843 reprint of a 1644 pamphlet-- implying that these notions of authority vested in the congregation still had some currency in Joseph Smith's period. In this introduction to Cotton's work, Phillip Nye goes over some of the same ground.

Comment:
Primarily a negotiation of the power relations between clergy and congregation in the Puritan community, this pamphlet also strikes some anti-Catholic chords and touches on the relationship of "keys" to knowledge. (Multiple index entries). Nye in particular looks at the notion of keys in relation to power in the church.

"The Saints (in these knowing times) finding that the Key of knowledge hath so farre opened their hearts, that they see with their owne eyes into the substantialls of Godlinesse, and that through the instruction and guidance of their teachers, they are enabled to understand for themselves such other things as they are to joy in the practice of. They doe therefore further (many of them) begin more then to suspect, that some share in the Key of power should likewise appertain unto them" (2).
"Christ says to St. Peter, Matthew xvi:"Thou art, or art called, Peter; and on the Petram (i.e., on the rock) I will build My Church. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven.' From these words they [the papists] have claimed the keys for St. Peter alone; but the same Matthew has barred such erroneous interpretation in the xviii. chapter, where Christ says to all in common, 'Verily, I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven.' It is clear that Christ here interprets His own words, and in this xviii. Chapter explains the former xvi.; namely, that the keys are given to St. Peter in the stead of the whole Church, and not for his own person" (135-136).

Luther makes it clear that in reformation theology, the "keys of the kingdom are synonymous with the ability to forgive sins.

Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):
"Fourth. The people of God, or holy Christians, are known by the keys, which they publicly use. Christ decrees, in Matthew xviii that if a Christian sins, he shall be rebuked, and if he does not amend his ways, he shall be bound and cast out; but if he amends, he shall be set free. This is the power of the keys. Now the use of the keys is two-fold,--public, and private. There are some whose consciences are so weak and timid, that even if they have received no public condemnation, they cannot be comforted unless they get a special absolution from the pastor. On the other hand, there are some who are so hard they will not have their sins individually forgiven and remitted even in their hearts and byt he pastor. Therefore the use of keys must be of both kinds, public and private. Now wherever you see the sins of some persons forgiven or rebuked, publicly or privately, know that God's people is there; for if God's people is not there, the keys are not there; and if the keys are not there, God's people is not there. Christ has bequeathed them as a public mark and holy possession, whereby the Holy Ghost, won through Christ's death, imps holiness anew to fallen sinners and by them Christians confess that they are a holy people, under Christ, in this world; and those who will not be converted and made holy again are to be cast out of this holy people; that is, they are bound and excluded by means of the keys" (128-129).

"I believe that in this congregation, and nowhere else, there is forgiveness of sins; and outside of it, good works, however great they be or many, are of no avail for the forgiveness of sins; but that within it, no matter how much, how greatly or how often men may sin, nothing can hinder forgiveness of sins, which abides wherever and as long as this one congregation abides. To this congregation Christ gives the keys, and says, in Matthew xviii, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven." In like manner He says in Matthew xvi, to the one man Peter, who stands as the representative oft he one and only Church, "Whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (124).

Comment:
This small pamphlet offers little in the way of interesting or distinctive doctrine, opting instead for homey, advice based on the New Testament instruction to "love your neighbor." The pamphlet interested me because the title presents a situation where a "key" opens the gate of heaven. The implications of the metaphor are never really pursued, however, and the "key to heaven" remains on a highly abstract level-- the "key to heaven" is simply to live a good Christian life. The description of heaven (two separate index entries) is also useful inspite of its lack of specificity, providing, as it does, one example of how heaven is conceived during the period.

Comment:
While this source does not contain the highest levels of Masonry, it does indicate that the finding of the g-shaped key cited in the second half of other editions of this book exists. That is, Hiram Abiff does have "a key" to his word about him, in the form of the faint letter 'G' on his breast. This implies that what we learn in the second half of the 1882 version is probably accurate.

Excerpt (pages):
"The worshipful Master approaching me from the East, under the sign and due-guard of an Entered Apprentice Mason . . . proceeded to give me the grip and word of an Entered Apprentice Mason, and bid me arise and salute the Junior and Senior Wardens and convince them that I had been regularly initiated as an Entered Apprentice Mason, and was in possession of the sign, grip, and word" (51).
"The conductor says to the candidate, 'brother in further imitation of our Grand Master, Hiram Abiff, let us retire at the South Gate.' They then advance to the Junior Warden [who represents Jubela, one of the ruffians] who exclaims,--- 'Who comes here? (The room is dark, or the candidate hoodwinked,) the conductor answers, 'our Grand Master Hiram Abiff.' 'Our Grand Master Hiram Abiff! Exclaims the ruffian, 'he is the very man I wanted to see, [seizing the candidate by the throat at the same time, and jerking him about with violence] give me the Master Masons word, or I'll take your life.'" (112).
"The Master then orders fifteen Fellow crafts to be selected from the bands of the workmen, and sent three East, three West, three North, three South, and three in and about the Temple in search of their Grand Master Hiram Abiff, [in some lodges they only send twelve, when their own lectures say fifteen were sent,] and charge them if they find the body to examine carefully on and about for the Master's word or key to it . . . . they report . . . that they had searched carefully on and about the body for the Master's word, but had not discovered any thing but a faint resemblance of the letter G on the left breast. The Master on the receipt of this information, (raising himself,) raises his hands three several times above his head, (as herein before described) and exclaims, 'Nothing but a faint resemblance of the letter G! that is not the Master's word nor a key to it. I fear the Master's word is for ever lost!' . . . "O Lord my god! Is there no help for the widow's son!" (117-118).

In the conclusion of the Master Mason section: "consequently the word was lost, and supposed to be forever; but the sequel will show it was found after a lapse of four hundred and seventy years, not withstanding the word Mah hah bon, which was substituted by Solomon, still continues to be used by Master Masons, and no doubt will as long as Masonry attracts the attention of men; and the word which was lost is used in the Royal Arch degree" (148).

"The Master then produces the same key stone, concerning which, so much has already been said . . . . He then presents the stone to the candidate and says, 'I now present you with a white stone, on which is written a new name; we give the words that form this circle; (the letters are so engraved on the stone as to form a circle;) the initials are H. T. W. S. S. T. K. S. Hiram Tyran, Widow's Son, sent to King Solomon. These placed in this form were the mark of our Grand Master, Hiram Abiff. At present they are used as the general MARK of this degree, and in the center of them each brother places his own individual MARK" (169).

But the points in controversy betwixt us are, first, whether these things and all of them, and with them all other church affairs not here mentioned, be so appropriated to the officers, as that none other may meddle with them: and second, whether this power be committed to them immediately from, and by Christ, or mediately from Christ by the church: which consideration whilst you neglect, you err yourself, deceive such as follow you, and injure them you oppose. . . .

"That by the keys is meant the gospel of Christ, opening a way by him, and his merits, as the door into the kingdom, I have formerly declared, and we must take heed of that deep delusion of antichrist, in imagining that this power of binding or loosing sins, of opening or shutting heaven's gates, is tied to any office, or order in the church; it depends only upon Christ, who alone properly forgiveth sins, and hath the key of David which opens, and no man shuts; and shuts, and no man opens, Mark ii. 7; Rev. iii. 7: and this key externally is the gospel, which with himself he gives to his church . . . . I do by the way gather this much, that since the keys of the kingdom of heaven is the gospel, and that the gospel is given to the whole church, and to every member of it, whether there be ministers or no, it therefore followeth, that the keys are given to all and every member alike, as the gospel is, though not to be used alike by all and every one, which were gross confusion, but according to the order prescribed by Christ" (157).

Beliefs of the Papists and the Protestants seem faulty:
1. "That any key of the kingdom of heaven should be left without power. For here in his distribution, the key of knowledge is contradistinguished from a key of power" (26).
2. "There is a real defect in omitting an integral part of the keys, which is that key of power or liberty, which belongeth to the Church itself" (26).
"The key of Faith, is the same which the Lord Jesus calleth the key of knowledge, Luke 11. 52 . . . . This key therefore, the key of knowledge (saving knowledge) or which is all one, the key of faith, is common to all believers" (29).
"The key of Order is the power whereby every member of the Church walketh orderly himself, according to his place in the Church, and helpeth his brethren, to walk orderly also" (29).
"As the keys of the kingdom of heaven be divers, so are the subjects to whom they are committed, divers . . . . The key of knowledge (or which is all one, the key of Faith) belongeth to all the faithful, whether joined to any particular church or no . . . . The key of order (speaking as we do of Church order, as Paul doth, Col. 2. 5) belongeth to all such, who are in Church order, whether Elders or Brethren" (35).
"The key of Authoritie or Rule, is committed to the Elders of the Church, and so the act of Rule is made the proper act of their office . . . . The special acts of this rule are many. The first and principal is that which the Elders who labour in the Word and Doctrine, are chiefly to attend unto, that is, the preaching of the Word with all Authoritie . . . . A second act of Authoritie common to the Elders is, they have power, as any weighty occasion shall require, to call the Church together . . . ." (51-52).

Nature of Source:
John Cotton attempts to clearly position the elders of the Puritan church in relation to the congregation. Particularly interesting since this is actually an 1843 reprint of a 1644 pamphlet—implying that these notions of authority vested in the congregation still had some currency in Joseph Smith's period.

Library Location: Z 1236 .L5 1971

Comment:
Primarily a negotiation of the power relations between clergy and congregation in the Puritan community, this pamphlet also strikes some anti-Catholic chords and touches on the relationship of "keys" to knowledge. (Multiple index entries) These particular passages detail the exact nature of a "key" in Cotton's version of Puritan theology. For him, the "keys" particularly concern a member's "outward estate in the church"—that is, the "keys of the kingdom" are the keys which allow the elders of the church to allow or refuse sacrament or membership to a particular member. These keys are vested in the church body, but exercised by the elders.

Excerpt (pages):
"The Keyes of the Kingdom of Heaven are promised by the Lord Jesus (the head and King of his Church) unto Peter . . . . The words being Allegorical, are therefore somewhat obscure: and holding forth honor and power in the Church, are therefore controversall; For where there is no honour (nor pride to pursue it) there is no contention" (19).
"It will not therefore be amisse, for opening of the Doctrine of the Power of the keyes; somewhat to open the words of this Text, whereon that power is built. Five words require a little clearing:" (20)
1. What is here meant by the Kingdome of Heaven?
"By the Kingdome of Heaven is here meant both the Kingdome of Grace, which is the Church; and the Kingdome of Glory, which is the highest heavens;" (20).
2. What are the keyes of this kingdom, and the giving of them?
"The keyes of the kingdom are the Ordinances which Christ hath instituted, to be administered in his church; as the preaching of the Word, (which is the opening and applying of it) also the administering of the Seals and censures; For by the opening and applying of these, both the gates of the Church here, and of heaven hereafter, are opened or shut to the sons of men" (20).
3. What are the acts of these Keyes, which are said to be binding and loosing?
"The acts of these keys, are said here to be binding and loosing, which are not the proper acts of material keyes; for their acts be opening and shutting, which argueth the keyes here spoken of be not materiall keyes, but metaphorical; and yet being keyes they have a power also of opening and shutting . . . these keys of Christs Kingdome, have such a power of opening and shutting, as that they do thereby, binde and loose, and remit: in shutting they binde, and retain" (21).
4. What is the object of these acts to be bound or loosed, here put under generall name, Whatesoever?
The Text in Mat. 16. 9 saith, whatsoever, which reacheth not (so far as the Papists would stretch it) to whatsoever oathes, or covenants, or contracts, or counsels, or lawes . . . . But this word whatsoever is here put in the Neuter Gender, to imply both things and persons; Things, as sins; Persons, as those that commit them . . . . Now this binding and loosing of whatsoever sins, in whosoever commit them, is partly in the conscience of the sinner, and partly in his outward estate in the Church" (22).

5. "Who is the subject recipient of this power, or to whom is this power given?" (20). This is best answered by saying that the keys were given to Peter as an apostle, as an elder and as a believer (23).

"Now in other scriptures it appeareth; First, That Christ gave the power of retaining or remitting of sins (that is . . . the whole power of the keys) to all the Apostles as well as to Peter Joh. 20. 21. 23. Secondly, It appeareth also that the apostles commended the rule and government of every particular Church to the Elders (the presbytery) of that church, Heb. 13. 17. 1 Tim. 5. 17. . . . Thirdly, It appeareth farther that Christ gave the power of the keys to the Body likewise of the Church, even to the Fraternatie with the Presbytery" (24).

"So that when Christ said to Peter, To thee will I give the keyes of the kingdom of heaven: If Peter then received the whole power of the keys, then he stood in the roome and name of all such, as have received any part of the power of the keys, whether Apostles, or Elders, or Churches. Or if he stood in the roome of an Apostle onely, yet that hindreth not, but that as he there received the power of an Apostle, so the rest of the Apostles received the same power, either there or elsewhere: and the Presbytery of each church received, if not there, yet elsewhere, the power belonging to their office: and in like sort each Church or Congregation of professed Believers, received that portion also of Church-power which belonged to them" (25).

Comment:

An important source for anyone studying the relationship of magic practice and belief in relation to Joseph Smith—particularly if Quinn is right in suggesting that the book had wide influence and circulation. Perhaps most striking is the strongly Christian worldview underlying The Magus. That is, magic exists within a clearly Christian paradigm, and the text repeatedly links elements of the occult (both good and bad magic) with either God or the Devil. Positive stones or charms are the result of God's administration and governance, while the monstrous spirits that roam the woods are the perverse result of Satan's occult tampering with the apple in the garden of Eden. The presence of Christian and magic belief existing in such close relation seems to support the thesis that Joseph Smith and early Mormon converts would not have been uncomfortable with the language of a magic world view. (Multiple index entries)

These passages present a picture of all the usages of "key" in The Magus. The instances reveal that "key" is used both in the sense of mysterious "cipher" and as a literal key (a key to the mysteries, and a key to death and hell).

"We shall describe the wonderful properties of man, in which we may trace in miniature the exact resemblance or copy of the universe; by which means we shall come to the more easy understanding of whatever we may have to declare concerning the knowledge of the inferior nature, such as animals, plants, metals, and stones; for, by our first declaring the occult qualities and properties that are hid in the little world, it will serve as a key to the opening of all the treasures and secrets of the macrocosm, or great world: therefore we shall hasten to speak of the creation of man, and his divine image . . ." (13-14).

Key as Cipher/mirror:

"In this last book, which we have made the Perfection and Key of all that has been written, we have given thee the whole and entire practice of Ceremonial Magic, shewing what is to be done every hour of the day; so that as by reading what we have heretofore written, thou shalt contemplate in theory, here thou shalt be made perfect by experiment and practice: for in this Key you may behold, as in a mirror, the distinct functions of the spirits, and how they are to be drawn into communication in all places, seasons, and times" (Book II, 73).

"Chap. XLVI. The conclusion of the constellatory practice, or talismanic magic; in which is included the key of all that has been written upon this subject; shewing the practice of images, &c. by way of example, and likewise the necessary observations of the celestials, towards the perfection of talismanic operations" (172).

Following Revelations:

"And of this sort there are two pentacles of sublime virtue and great power, very useful and necessary to be used in the consecration of experiments and spirits; one whereof is that in the first chapter of the Apocalypse, to wit, a figure of the majesty of God sitting upon a throne, having in his mouth a two-edged sword, as there is described; about which let there be written, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. I am the First and the Last, who am living, and was dead, and behold I live for ever and ever; and I have the keys of death and hell'" (82).

Comment: It is intersting that this description replaces the narrative of the key in the shape of the letter G with the narrative about finding the Ark of the Covenant. The Ark contains a piece of paper on which is a key to decoding the writing. This is particularly interesting because it loses the important threads set up in the first three degrees. Other Masonic narratives stress that the box—which in those narratives is not necessarily the ark of the covenant—has a key hole which requires the G shaped key which is found by some masons near the temple and kept as an emblem.

Deut. 31. 24-26 is also cited, in which the Lord instructs the Levites to put the book of the law in the Ark of the Covenant.
"Q. Was there any thing further found in the ark? A. There was a key to the ineffable characters belonging to this degree, as follows:" A cipher follows, matching up the letters of the alphabet with figures. (137-138)

After going through the questions, "The High Priest then placed crowns upon our heads, and told us that we were now invested with all the important secrets of this degree, and crowned and received as worthy companions Royal Arch Masons . . . . Perhaps most striking is the strongly Christian world view underlying The Magus. That is, magic exists within a clearly Christian paradigm, and the text repeatedly links elements of the occult (both good and bad magic) with either God or the Devil. Positive stones or charms are the result of God's administration and governance, while the monstrous spirits that roam the woods are the perverse result of Satan's occult tampering with the apple in the garden of Eden. The presence of Christian and magic belief existing in such close relation seems to support the thesis that Joseph Smith and early Mormon converts would not have been uncomfortable with the language of a magic world view. This is an interesting passage because it relates a narrative of decay and sin which would be familiar to LDS, but the narrative arc is applied to magic: in the old days, the "ancients knew that in Nature the greatest secrets lay hid," but, in "latter days, men give themselves almost wholly up to vice and luxury" leading to a loss of the magic arts.
Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist
Excerpt (pages): "The wise ancients knew that in Nature the greatest secrets lay hid, and wonderful active powers were dormant, unless excited by the vigorous faculty of the mind of man; but as, in these latter days, men give themselves almost wholly up to vice and luxury, so their understandings have become more and more depraved; 'till, being swallowed up in the gross senses, they become totally unfit for divine contemplations and deep speculations in Nature; their intellectual faculty being drowned in obscurity and dulness, by reason of their sloth, intemperance, or sensual appetites. The followers of Pythagoras enjoined silence, and forbade the eating of flesh of animals . . . they were cautious, and aware of the vanity of vain babbling and fruitless cavillations . . . by these means they qualified themselves for spiritual matters, and attained unto great and excellent mysteries . . . they mortified their lusts, lived temperately, chaste, honest and virtuous; which government is so contrary to the practice of modern Christians, that they live as if the blessed word had come upon the earth to grant them privilege to sin" (11).

Nature of Source:

This work, written by a Past Grand Master of masonry, is intended "to explain the nature and design of the Masonic institution, to those who may be desirous of becoming acquainted with its principles, whether for the purpose of initiation into the society, or merely for the gratification of their curiosity" (1).

Comment:

Another lengthy treatment of Freemasonry by a loyal Mason. Outlines the various stages and ranks of masons along with accompanying introductory speeches, scriptures, prayers, and stories. Little mention is made of the more secretive aspects of Masonry which would be of interest to LDS researchers. A useful background source, but not too informative.

Excerpts:

"Of the GLOBES. The globes are two artificial spherical bodies, on the convex surface of which are represented the countries, seas, and varous parts of the earth, the face of the heavens, the planetary revolutions, and other particulars.

The sphere, with the parts of the earth delineated on its surface, is called the terrestrial globe; and that, with the constellations, and other heavenly bodies, the celestial globe" (49-50).

"Let the Mitre, with which you are invested, remind you of the dignity of the office you sustain, and its inscription impress upon your mind a sense of your dependence upon God; that perfection is not given unto man upon the earth, and that perfect holiness belongeth alone unto the Lord."
The Breastplate, with which you are decorated, in imitation of that upon which you are decorated, in imitation of that upon which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes, and worn by the high priest of Israel, is to teach you that you are always to bear in mind your responsibility to the laws and ordinances of the institution, and that the honour and interest of your chapter and its members should be always near your heart" (190).

Elisha Peck, Elder in, and from the Christian Church," argues extensively that Christians should abandon "all Party Names and Spirit" and hints at a restoration in the form of "the second apostolic church."

"If this work be of men, it will come to nought; if of God, you cannot overthrow it; lest happily you may be found a fighting against God" (8).

Those who say "you must not expect any more miracles or Prophets, only false ones; nor dreams or visions, for it is dangerous to trust these things given by the Spirit" are "in awful danger, for they are overlooking the new Testament Prophets, really as the Jews did the old. The apostle saith, they that are spiritual, try these things by the spirit, spiritual with spiritual. 1. Cor. 2: 13. And again God will pour out his spirit, and your old men shall dream, young men see visions, &c. You will say this was fulfilled at Pentacost; but take care; it only began to be fulfilled at that time-- and is to be completed at the rise of the second Apostolic church. That is now rising with no other name but Christian-- answering to the second Jerusalem. Again I call you to consider the New Testament prophecy; where it saith, God hat chosen the foolish things to confound the wise; and hte weak to confound the mighty. Yea, the things which are not to bring to nought the things that are. That all may see that the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God . . . . This is soon to be fulfilled, yea, it may have begun with or by this instrument, and the pure church arising" (8-9).

One of Elisha Peck's several credentials: "Whose character, call, gifts, grace and abilities, we have proved to our satisfaction: upon which, we have deemed him to be a proper subject of Ordination-- accordingly proceeded publickly and regularly, by the laying on of hands, to ordain him as an evangelist, in full fellowship, to go forth according to the gospel mission, into all the world, and preach and administer in all hte holy ordinances in the church of Christ" (15).

Nature of Source: The famous anti-masonry tract that resulted in the death of William Morgan and the subsequent vilification of masons in America. This particular document is an 1882 reprint of the original which was published in 1828. It is important to note that this version and the earlier versions ([1828] and 1830, for instance) differ significantly. It appears that the second half was added, or added to, although it also seems to be an accurate representation of the higher levels of Masonry. It would be interesting to do a close comparison of the 1830 version and the 1882 version. Two parts are present in the version: the first, actually written by Morgan himself, resembles the earlier versions. The second, written by an anonymous "Member of the Craft," details the higher levels of masonry.

Comment: Obviously, this work is filled with material of interest to researchers interested in many aspects of Mormonism and its origins. Of particular interest, however are the ways in which the idea of "keys" appears in this text. The first section of this document contains material related to the ancientness of the masonic order, the usage of pass-words, tokens, etc., and the idea of a "key" as a hint or a special bit of information that allows access to other, higher knowledge.

Saint Paul and his brethren did not demand "peculiar regard" for themselves as "christian teachers, because they were men of distinguished gifts, nor even because they were good men; but because they were ministers of Christ. It was for their work's sake. It was on account of the dignity, and usefulness of their office" (3).

Considered first as a "teacher of divine truth." "This is the most obvious and most important view of the christian minister's work. He publishes the word of God. He is the grand medium of communicating to the world the knowledge of the true religion. And he is the only medium that can be relied upon as effectual. I shall not stop to prove this" (4).

Minister's are important because they prevent damnation and promote salvation. Notion of heaven: "Think what it is to be adorned with divine grace; to bear the image of him, who was holy, harmless, undefiled; and after being made perfect in holiness, to dwell where Jesus is, and be forever filled with all the fulness of God" (5). "And how great would be the usefulness of the sacred office, if ministers should be successful in bringing all this blessedness upon you alone! But this good is to be conferred upon thousands and millions innumerable" (5).
"The scheme of truth, contained in the Bible, makes known the perfections of God and the principles of his government, vindicates his character and administration from the reproaches of a wicked world . . ." (5).

"Christian ministers" stand " in relation to the glorious Redeemer. They stand in relation to his universal kingdom. They are his agents in the great work of promoting the interest of that kingdom. . . . His ministers are and must be the grand agents in this work. They must open the book of prophecy, and proclaim the approach of the day, when the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth. By their moving addresses" (9).

(Vaguely reminiscent of D&C 4)

A list of tasks, followed by: "In these great movements of divine providence, the ministers of Christ must be the principal agents. The Lord of the universe has appointed them to this work, and has promised them strength to accomplish it. Let them take their place thankfully; for it is a place of higher honor, than any mortal ever deserved. Let them take their place humbly; for it is a place of condescending, self-denying labor. Let them take their place with resolution and suffering. Let them march forward with steady pace, their eyes fixed on God, their hearts trusting in his strength, and panting to see the day, when his kingdom shall come, and his will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven" (9).

Hosea Ballou became known as the primary formulator of the tenents of American Universalism. Starting from a Calvinist Baptist background, Ballou developed radical doctrines of a unitary God with Christ as divine agent and of the atonement. He suggested that all of humanity good look forward to eventual reunification with God. Ballou's teachings are of interest to anyone exploring the apparent anti-universalist arguments in the Book of Mormon as well as Joseph's later revelations (D&C 76 for instance) which introduce a form of univeral (if tiered) salvation. "Treatise on Atonement" is one of Ballou's key pamphlets arguing his case.

Comment:
This is a prodigious, rambling treatise on the subject of universal salvation. Although there are clear echoes of this kind of teaching to be found in the Book of Mormon, it is also interesting to note how some of these threads of argument and the very language used turns up in the Book of Mormon and in Joseph Smith's writings-- only it is used to support a different conclusion. For instance, Ballou discusses how the weight of "infinite" sin "thwarts" God's plan-- a mode of argument which appears in 2 Ne. 2. It is also useful to compare this form of universalism to the type of "universalism" to be found in D&C 76.

Researchers: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):
The opposers of universalism have "endeavored to show the absurdity of believing that men could be received into the kingdom of glory and righteousness, in their sins; which no Universalist ever believed" (vii).
"The punishment, or sufferings, which we endure, in consequence of sin, is not a dispensation of any penal law, but of the law of necessity, in which law, as long as a cause continues, it produces its effects" (ix).
"I have before observed, and I think justly, that the intention of a legislature, in legislation, must be thwarted, in order for the law, to take cognizance of sin. Now if God, in a direct sense of speaking, be the legislator of the law which is thwarted by transgression, in the same direct sense of speaking, his intentions in legislation are thwarted. With eyes open, the reader cannot but see, that if sin be infinite because it is committed against an infinite law, whose author is God, the design of Deity must be abortive; to suppose which, brings a cloud of darkness over the mind, as intense as the supposition is erroneous. It cannot with any propriety be supposed, that any rational being can have an intention contrary to the knowledge which he possesses" (16).
"If sin be infinite in its nature, there can be no one sin greater than another. The smallest offence against the good of society, is equal to blasphemy against the Holy ghost. If what we call a small crime, be not infinite, the greatest cannot be, providing there is any proportion between the great and the small" (19-20).
"The reader may see, that no act can be determined to be morally good, or evil, by the consequences which follow, but only by the disposition, or intention, which the actor possesses when the act is done. Then, in order for the sin to be infinite, the intention of the transgressor must be infinite, embracing all the consequences that can ever arise from what he does; but this is never the case with finite beings" (22).
"I never adopted the belief of universal holiness and happiness out of choice, but from the force of real or supposed evidence. And I know you cannot believe it, on any other ground" (233).

Title of Book: Ministers of the Gospel should speak, not as pleasing man, but God, who tries their hearts: a sermon, preach'd at the ordination of the Rev. Mr. Ward Cotton, at Hampton, in new-Hampshire, June 19th, 1734.

Title of Article:

Place of Publication: Boston.

Publisher: B. Green.

Date of Publication: 1734.

Nature of Source: A pep talk of sorts for "Ministers of the Gospel" which sets forth two propositions: that "some are allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel" and that those ministers chosen "should make it their great concern and endeavor, so to speak, not as pleasing men, but GOD, who tries their Hearts" (5). Written by John Cotton, Puritan luminary of the early Eighteenth Century, this piece comments on the nature of a minister's call.

Library Location: BX 7232 .C67x 1734 [microform] (17097)

Comment: Cotton speaks of ministers being "authorized from Christ" and as "[receiving] their commission from him" (5). Later, Cotton describes the "imposition of the Hands of the Presbytery" by which ministers are "set apart to the Gospel Ministry" (5). Like other early American religious sources of this kind, the rhetoric of a call, a setting-apart, and of an authorized priesthood is present, but left unexplicated. That is, the process by which Christ might "authorize" his ministers is not discussed, nor is the implication of an actual physical setting-apart explored. Nothing on keys here, either.

Excerpt (pages):

"Prop. I. Some are allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel. And these are Christ's Ministers, regularly call'd and set apart to the work of the Gospel-Ministry. The Lord Jesus Christ has instituted a standing Gospel-Ministry in his Church, to continue to the end of the World. It is his Sovereign Will and Pleasure, that there should be an Order of Men to represent his Person, publish his Laws, exhibit the promises & administer Seals and Censures; this is evident from the promise of Christ's presence to be with his Ministers to the end of the World, Matt. 28. 20. And because the reason of such an institution of Men to this service will always continue. Now with these is the Gospel intrusted; they are allow'd of God to be put in trust with the Gospel. It is God, who raises them up, who gifts and qualifies them for serving their Generation in the Gospel of his Son, and inclines their hearts to engage therein. They are authorized from Christ, the King and Head of his visible Church and People, to discharge the Office of Gospel Ministers. They receive their commission from him. And they are introduc'd into their awful Station by Persons authorized by Christ thereunto. The are by the Imposition of the Hands of the Presbytery, and solemn Prayer, set apart to the Gospel Ministry, and so bro't under solemn bonds & obligations, and endow'd with all the privileges & powers that belong to that sacred Office" (5).

"They act in Christ's name, on his behalf; he gives them their instructions, puts words into their mouths. The solemn Charge given to them at their Ordination, is in the Name of Christ; they preach the Gospel in his Name, and so with authority and power. And what they deliver agreeable to the Oracles of God, it is the word of God and not of man, and accordingly to be attended to, and regarded by us" (6).

In spite of the difficulties of tracing a direct link between these rare documents and Joseph Smith, the document remains of some interest to LDS scholars. For instance, some of the most interesting segments of "Greater Key" are the introductory narratives which appear to be more modern than the rest of the document-- or at least appear to have been tampered with by translators. These introductions seem resemble the storytelling style and tone of similar instructional tales in Masonry. The introductions also contain compelling speculation about the nature of man and the relation of the Christian and the Occult. While not as ancient, these passages suggest how magic began to be used by a culture that embraced both Christian and Magic cultures.

This particular passage is interesting because it hints at the combination in man of terrestrial and celestial matter, as well as God wish "to bring His works to perfection . . ."

"Firstly. It is necessary for thee to understand that God, having made all things, in order that they may be submitted unto Him, hath wished to bring His works to perfection, by making one which participates of the Divine and of the Terrestrial, that is to say, Man; whose body is gross and terrestrial, while his soul is spiritual and celestial, unto whom He hath had subject the whole earth and its inhabitants, and hath given unto Him means by which He may render the Angels familiar, as I call those Celestial creatures . . ." One of D. Michael Quinn's favorite sources in Early Mormonism and the Magic World View. Quinn argues that The Magus was an immensely popular source for folk magic practice and belief, on both sides of the ocean. My study this summer involves "keys," so I haven't looked into all the ways Quinn uses The Magus. For this reason, it would be worth reading (in its convenient, reprinted form) for anyone working with Magic World View. (Please note that the version of The Magus I reviewed is a facsimile reprint of the original, published in 1967.)

Library Location: BF 1611 .b3x 1975.

Comment:
An important source for anyone studying the relationship of magic practice and belief in relation to Joseph Smith—particularly if Quinn is right in suggesting that the book had wide influence and circulation. Perhaps most striking is the strongly Christian worldview underlying The Magus. That is, magic exists within a clearly Christian paradigm, and the text repeatedly links elements of the occult (both good and bad magic) with either God or the Devil. Positive stones or charms are the result of God's administration and governance, while the monstrous spirits that roam the woods are the perverse result of Satan's occult tampering with the apple in the garden of Eden. The presence of Christian and magic belief existing in such close relation seems to support the thesis that Joseph Smith and early Mormon converts would not have been uncomfortable with the language of a magic worldview. This passage presents a combination of Platonism with animism that comes out sounding almost like the creation account in the book of Abraham—presenting a hierarchy of intelligences where every animate and inanimate thing possesses a portion of intelligence. In this passage, for example "all virtue in stones, herbs, metals, and all other things, may come from the intelligences, the governors." It remains unclear whether the animation originates from God in a way similar to the light of Christ, or whether each individual rock possesses its own portion.

Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist

Excerpt (pages):

"It is to be noted, that God, in the first place, is the end and beginning of all virtue: he gives the seal of the ideas to his servants, the intelligences, who, as faithful officers, sign all things entrusted to them with an ideal virtue; the heavens and stars, as instruments, disposing the matter, in the mean while, for the receiving of those forms which reside in Divine Majesty, and to be conveyed by stars. And the Giver of forms distributes them by the ministry of his intelligences, which he has ordained as rulers and comptrollers over his works; to whom such a power is entrusted, in things committed to them, that so all virtue in stones, herbs, metals, and all other things, may come from the intelligences, the governors. Therefore the form and virtue of things come first from the ideas---then from the ruling and governing intelligences---then from the aspects of the heavens disposing---and, lastly, from the tempers of the elements disposed, answering the influences of the heavens, by which the elements themselves are ordered or disposed. These kinds of operations, therefore, are performed in these inferior things by express forms; and in the heavens, by disposing virtues; in intelligences, by mediating rules; in the original cause, by ideas and exemplary forms; all which must of necessity agree in the execution of the effect and virtue of every thing" (86).

Although described as a "universal spirit," the language and the universality of distribution here resembles the language used to describe the light of Christ

"There is, therefore, such a kind of medium required to be, by which celestial souls may be joined to gross bodies, and bestow upon them wonderful gifts. The spirit is, in the same manner, in the body of the world, as our spirit is in our bodies; for as the powers of our soul are communicated to the members of the body by the medium of the spirit, so also the virtue of the soul of the world is diffused, throughout all things, by the medium of the universal spirit; for there is nothing to be found in the whole world that hath not the spark of the virtue thereof. Now this spirit is received into things, more or less, by the rays of spirit, therefore, every occult property is conveyed into herbs, stones, metals, and animals, through sun, moon, planets, and through stars higher than the planets" (87).

Another source on Masonry, useful for correlating observations gleaned from other sources. There are a few things that were new to me here. Each oath not to disclose the signs and tokens is printed in detail, including the penalties for disobedience. We get another version of the Hiram Abish story, linking Hiram's death explicitly with keywords and the "grand sign" of the Master Mason.

Another lengthy treatment of Freemasonry by a loyal Mason. Outlines the various stages and ranks of masons along with accompanying introductory speeches, scriptures, prayers, and stories. Little mention is made of the more secretive aspects of Masonry which would be of interest to LDS researchers. A useful background source, but not too informative.

A very interesting account; of particular interest are her general tone and her visionary experiences. First, the style in which she relates her life story resembles Joseph Smith's method of relating his life (in the 1838 First Vision account). Second, her vision of the path, the river, and the multitude bear a close resemblance to Lehi's dream in the Book of Mormon. Finally, the frame of the story is the similar: an angelic companion carries his charge about, showing symbolic scenes and then interpreting them for the visionary.

Nature of Source:
According to Michael Quinn, the "Key of Solomon"-- a source and instruction book on magic-- is a medieval text which was widely circulated in manuscript form and contributed to the popularity of Cabalistic and ceremonial magic. As the editor notes, however, the manuscript was difficult to get a hold of, at least by 1915. Also of note from the 1915 translation which I looked at is the complicated transcription history of the document. de Laurence notes dozens of manuscripts which he consulted in piecing together the final translated version.

Comment:
In spite of the difficulties of tracing a direct link between these rare documents and Joseph Smith, the document remains of some interest to LDS scholars. For instance, some of the most interesting segments of "Greater Key" are the introductory narratives which appear to be more modern than the rest of the document-- or at least appear to have been tampered with by translators. These introductions seem resemble the storytelling style and tone of similar instructional tales in Masonry. The introductions also contain compelling speculation about the nature of man and the relation of the Christian and the Occult. While not as ancient, these passages suggest how magic began to be used by a culture that embraced both Christian and Magic cultures.

Solomon counseling his son, Roboam:
"O my Son Roboam . . . . in order that thou mayest understand how I have arrived at this degree (of wisdom), it is necessary to tell thee that one day, when I was meditating upon the power of the Supreme Being, the Angel of the great God appeared before me as I was saying, O how wonderful are the works of God! I suddenly beheld, at the end of a thickly-shaded vista of trees, a Light in the form of a blazing Star which said unto me with a voice of thunder: SOLOMON, SOLOMON, be not dismayed; the Lord is willing to satisfy thy desire by giving thee knowledge of whatsoever thing is most pleasant unto thee. I order thee to ask of Him whatsoever thou desirest. Whereupon, recovering from my surprise, I answered unto the Angel, that according to the Will of the Lord, I only desired the Gift of Wisdom, and by the Grace of God I obtained in addition the enjoyment of all the Celestial treasures and the knowledge of all natural things" (4)

When I am done instructing you, "I assure thee that the Graces of the Great God will be familiar unto thee, and that the Celestial and Terrestrial Creatures will be obedient unto thee, and a science which only works by the strength and power of natural things, and by the pure Angels which govern them. Of which latter I will give thee the names in order . . ." (4).

"On the 4th of January, 1788, I had the following dream:-- I thought I was travelling in a very pleasant, but uncommon path. It appeared as though the sun shined in this path, but not out of it; and the greater distance I looked forward, the brighter it appeared. I saw many little paths, which turned to the right and left, but the sun did not appear to shine in these paths; and I saw written on trees by the sides of these paths fears and doubts; but I thought there were no fears and doubts where the sun shined. I looked forward and saw one at a small distance before me, who appeared to be an angel. I asked him what road we were in. He said it was the Highway of Holiness, which we read of in Isaia. xxv. 8. I soon perceived at my left hand a black river, which ran back (not the way we were going.) I asked my guide, what river that was. He said, Pride. On the other side of this river I observed a great city, which was filled with people, who appeared to be in the greatest confusion, and running in every direction; many of them came from the city on to this river, and were carried away instantly by the current, which was very rapid. I asked my guide, what was the name of that city. He said, it was the city of destruction, and that it represented this world— I now had a most striking sense of the vanity of pride. The vast multitudes, which were drowned in this river (the representation of Pride) fully evinced its destructive consequences. Some of those whom I beheld were clothed in the most gorgeous apparel, which only served to hasten their destruction. I thought for myself that I must ever abhor this road to misery . . . We soon came in sight of a golden gate. I asked what that was. He said, it was the gate, through which the saints entered at death into the New-Jerusalem, or Heaven. It was at some distance; and I felt in haste, for I had a great desire to be there. When we drew nigh, I beheld a most beautiful angel looking toward us, who, my guide said, was the angel that attended the saints at their death" (12).

"At night, when I retired to sleep, I saw my guide, who told me, that in the glorious day, which was shortly to take place, the purity of Christ's church should be established; that miracles should be wrought by his faithful servants; that cripples, with those possessed with diseases, might be restored, which this angel told me, must be done by anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayers of two godly persons, or ministers; and that they must have faith, and in that day the Lord would do great things for Zion, and her watchmen should be of one mind" (13).

"Then I was carried very fast through the dark air, till I came to a black sea. A black mountain appeared to down to this sea. The place was awful and terrible to behold. I was immediately carried into this mountain, where was most terrible darkness, to such a degree that I could feel it . . . I began to cry, My Father, my Father who art in heaven, appear in mercy! I was instantly brought out of this place into a plain field; and the earth appeared bright as if something did shine upon it" (21).

Library Location: 080 Sh64a no. 22058.
Comment:
A fascinating document detailing Hughes' logic and reasoning on the impending destruction and subsequent coming of the Savior. Here is another instance of the author being swept away in a dream and being shown things and then having them explained by a spirit guide.
Researcher: Jason H. Lindquist
Excerpt (pages):
"And as it has happened in every age, that when the Lord commissioned any of his servants, the prophets, to bear his word to the children of men, he qualified them for their awful mission by such visions, direct revelations, and often sever trials and exercises, so convinced them that they must obey his voice, or perish; so also that he prepared him, whose task it is, to publish these words, in obedience to the Lord's command, and that he may at least deliver his own soul" (4).
And yet, "few can be found who would countenance the man, who could declare himself commissioned by the God of Daniel, to explain any hidden or mysterious matter which they of themselves did not perceive to be contained in the Holy Scriptures" (5).
"But the Lord has been pleased to reveal to his servant N. H. that at the end of two years and sixty-two days from the date of this book, this dreadful prophecy must be accomplished, and in its accomplishment, the one third of all mankind throughout the earth shall be destroyed, and all those whom it shall please the Lord to spare must also suffer such trouble as never was before" (7).
"Hoping, that through the great mercy of God, this solemn warning will have the blessed effect of bringing sinners to a due consideration of their awful situation; and with earnest prayer that it might bring repentance to many" (11).
Key doctrines become points of dissention: "The two great sacraments ordained in the church of Christ, and which should be bonds of union amongst true believers have been made the causes of the greatest dissention. . . For instance-- the sacrament of baptism, which should unite all christians in one church, has been made the means of dividing them into several parties; one party is for washing, another for plunging or dipping, another for pouring, another for sprinkling with water" (16).
"There is a notion which greatly prevails in the world, and that not only amongst those who despise all scripture, and condemn all revelation, but also amongst the professors of religion, who profess to believe the bible, that all prophecyings have ceased upon earth; and that here is no more of divine revelation communicated to mankind! . . . Strange as it may appear, yet there are some who not only profess to believe the gospel, but who take upon them to be ministers and teachers of religion, who will say, and sharply contend for it too, that all prophecyings have ceased; or that all the spirit of prophecy has been withdrawn!-- Yet long after this memorable day [pentacost], St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Corinthians, when he exhorts that church, and all other christians of consequence, that they should earnestly covet the best gifts, but rather that they might prophecy-- see the 14th chapter of Paul's 1st Epistle to the Corinthians throughout" (20-21).

Cites Acts 13th chap. 40, 41.: "Beware, therefore, lest that come upon you which is spoken of in the prophets; Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish: for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you" (21).

""The burden of the Lord is upon me, and I must make a true report; and happy are they who shall believe it, and who, by earnestly turing unto the Lord with their whole heart, shall obtain deliverance in the great day of his VISITATION.

I Nimrod Hughes . . . was from my infancy, peculiarly warned and called by the gracious admonitions of the Lord, to forsake all the trifling vanities of life, and enter fully into the service of the Lord God" (20-21).

"As I lay in prison reflecting on the serious calls from the Lord, which I had long slighted and disobeyed, and considering what might be the meaning of my then present situation, I saw as it were, the roof of my prison opened, and I was immediately taken, in the spirit, and carried away into the wilderness. And I saw a deep and dismal dark pit, and the sight of it filled me with horror: for it appeared to widen as it descended, and I was placed upon the brink of it, and the dept of it, was beyond the reach of my sight. Then I looked and an innumerable crowd, the spirits of men and women, of every rank and station in the world, all rushing on from every direction towards this pit, and as they came they tumbled headlong down; then indeed I feared and trembled exceedingly, and it was then given to me to know, that this vision represented the suddenness of the destruction which the Lord bringeth upon the earth for the punishment of the sins of its inhabitants . . . . And I was carried from this place, but the dread of the vision filled my mind wiht awe and fear; for it was commanded me that I should publish these unwelcome tidings to the world. And I looked again and I saw three birds in one nest, each about the size of a dove, and two were white as snow, and one was red as blood, and the three birds arose from the nest, and they were separated, two and one; the two that were white, flew together towards the east, and the one that was as red as blood, flew towards the north, and was devoted to destruction: Then I sought to know the meaning of this vision, and it was then revealed to me, that for the gross wickedness of the world, the Lord had determined to bring a destructive wind over the face of the earth, and a horrible tempest, in which one third of mankind shall be destroyed . . . . And I looked and I beheld the sun, and in the sun the appearance of a man, or rather of an angel: and the moment I beheld him my spirit was revived, and I felt the greatest comfort and happiness of soul" (22-23).

"And as they were blown past me I could hear them exclaim amidst their frightful shrieks and bitter roaring: "O! Now I know that hughes was right. He declared the truth, but we would not believe it" (24).

"Moreover the Lord further revealed to me what he purposed to do among the nations of the earth after this great time of trouble should be past; and of the great favour and loving kindness which he would confer even upon me, who though poor and in obscurity, yet the Lord careth for me: For after that will this scripture be fulfilled: "Many that are first shall be last and the last first" (24-25).

The Wayne Sentinel is a Palmyra newspaper first published October 1, 1823. The newspaper is considered significant by many scholars since Joseph Smith probably had some exposure to the contents. Asa Wild originally submitted his letter to the Mohawk Herald, but the story was picked up by the Wayne Sentinel. Wild also published a longer pamphlet on the same topic entitled A Short Sketch of the Religious Experience, and Spiritual Travels, of Asa Wild, of Amsterdam, N. Y. Written by himself, by divine Command, and the most infallible Inspiration. Wild has been used many times to demonstrate continuities between Joseph's experience and the surrounding culture. Dan Vogel, for instance, situates both Wild and Joseph Smith within a culture of "religious seekers."
Comment:
Soon after the paper's inception, the Wayne Sentinel published Asa Wild's claim to direct revelation from God-- that a new, pre-millenial dispensation has dawned. Critics of Joseph Smith claim that many elements of the document parallel key points of Joseph Smith's early theology. Taken one by one, each of Wild's claims seem to diverge from what Joseph Smith later taught; taken as a whole, however, the thematic patterns of Wild's revelation-- declaration of a personal call, visionary encounters with deity, restorationist expectations, attention to corruption in contemporary churches, etc.-- do resemble Joseph Smith's ideas. Note that the original has no pagination.

Title of Book: An Attempt to nip in the Bud, the unscriptural Doctrine of Universal salvation, and some other dangerous errors connected with it; which a certain stranger, who calls himself John Murray, has, of late, been endeavoring to spread in the First Parish of Gloucester, to draw disciples after him. In a letter addressed to one of those that are drawn away; if possible to reclaim him and the others. To this end and in hopes that it may by the blessing of God serve also to confirm all in some of the most important doctrines of God's word, it is made public, in answer to the desire of a very respectable number of persons of reputation and influence in said paris. To which is subjoined, the dying testimony for the truth, and against error, of their worthy minister, the Reverend Mr. Samuel Chandler, lately deceased. By John Cleaveland, A.M. Pastor of the Second Church in Ipswich.

Nature of Source:
A pamphlet published in an attempt to counter one "John Murray," a "stranger" who had been wander the countryside preaching the "unscriptural Doctrine of Universal Salvation."

Comment:
According to Dan Vogel (in Religious Seekers and the Advent of Mormonism), the case Alma presents to his son Corianton is essentially anti-universalist. "Alma tells Corianton that, contrary to his Universalist beliefs, upon death there are two abodes for the spirits of God's children . . . . Universalists who often heard the orthodox argue against their beliefs using the parable of Lazarus and the rich man (Lk. 16: 1-31) would have easily identified with this argument." To support this assertion, Vogel references this pamphlet by John Cleaveland.

The pamphlet itself is quite interesting-- not just for the reasons Vogel suggests. This sources lays out the arguments against universalism in a clear way. Furthermore, Cleaveland use of language represents a way of writing and speaking about theological questions which he seems to have shared with Joseph Smith. Several of the arguments, and particularly the words used, the rhetorical constructions, etc., resemble the cadence of parts of the Book of Mormon, of Joseph Smith's other writings, and of other religious discourse in the period. I've tried to select the passages which seem most similar or which address a familiar gospel topic.

Excerpt (pages):
"If the doctrine of universal salvation, or of the final happiness of all men is true, we run no hazard in denying it to be true; we shall as certainly be saved and finally happy as those will who avouch it . . ." (iii).
"But what if this doctrine is not true? What if you have been given up to a strong delusion to believe a lie? Where will the sinner-- Where will the unbeliever, the impenent, the profane, the ungodly appear? . . . O my dear fellow-probationers, let us consider our latter end--" (iv).

"True holiness consists in real, hearty, practical conformity to our Lord's will in his word" (iv).

"I. That all men are naturally in a sinful, condemned, and perishing state-- Sinful, for there is none that doth good, no not one-- so then they that are in the flesh (as opposed to a being in the spirit) cannot please God." (5).

"II. That it is absolutely necessary that we be born of the Spirit-- have repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (5).

"III. That all such as die out of Christ, neglecting so great salvation, cannot escape damnation in hell forever" (8).

"I. That the time of life here on earth is our only probation-time for eternity. Behold now is the accepted time! Behold now is the day of salvation! . . . after death, they that are filthy will be filthy still; and they that are holy will be holy still" (10).

"2. That after death unto the final judgment, while our bodies are in the grave our souls will be in a fixed state of happiness or misery, according to the state we were in when we gave up the ghost; if in Christ, of happiness; if out of Christ-- of misery, and after the resurrection and final judgment the wicked will be in a state of punishment in soul and body forever and ever" (10).

If all mankind will be saved and happy, why "did Christ and his inspired Penmen of holy scripture speak of the damnation and punishment of wicked men, dying in their impenitence and unbelief, as being after the day of judgment, fixed for an eternal duration?" (11).

"But if, notwithstanding what Christ and his inspired Penmen say to the contrary, the damned, after sufferinge in hell a certain finite or limited duration, shall be translated to heaven: Before we can receive this as an article of faith, we must be able to produce in the scriptures of truth, a thus faith the Lord for it; but where will you find the divine testimony in the book of God, that the wicked in hell will in some future period, either before, at or after the day of judgment be delivered from the pains of hell and be made blessed in heaven forever?" (12).

"If the wicked in hell shall ever, hereafter, come out of hell and be blessed in heaven, they must first pay the very last farthing or mite of the debt of ten thousand talents, for which they were cast into the prison of hell; for they shall not come out thence until they have paid hte ver last farthing or mite . . . . Now it is possible for a finite Being ot suffer as much as he deserves to suffer for his sins, in a limited duration of time, or it is not: If it is possible, then we did not stand in absolute need of Christ, as an infinite Person to become our surety, and t make atonement for our sins by suffering for us" (13).

"The inflicting punishment on men or devils in hell has no tendency to take away their enmity against God, and to make them his cordial friends; but this is absolutely necessary to our enjoying heaven, if we do not love God for his own sake, if we do not love him supremely, yea, if we do not love him in all his moral character as the heaven of heaven, heaven will be no heaven to us!" (14).

"4. That the holy scriptures abundantly call upon us to watch and pray that we enter not into temptation" (14). And to be vigilant, etc.

"Such is the doctrine of universal salvation as advanced by the Stranger, his doctrine of purgatory or intermediate state, and of no application of Christ, or effectual calling, conversion, or believing in Christ as necessary in order to our being pardoned by God . . ." (19).

Some of the Calvinist doctrine remains in Cleaveland's account: "And sometimes all men signify all that the Father gave Christ out of the world of mankind-- all that the father chose in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they might be holy, &c. All that were predestined to the adoption of sons by Jesus Christ-- all that Christ calls his sheep for whom he laid down his life . . . all foreordained to be Christ's church, which he loved and gave himself for that &c-- foreordained to be members of his body . . ." (32).

"Hence from the considerations above, it appears, that God may as sincerely offer salvation to such as he knows will never accept of it, as to such as he is determined to make willing to accept of it in the day of his power, for God may sincerely treat men as men or as reasonable creators" (36).

PROGNOSTICATION!!

(From the Mohawk Herald)

We publish the following in compliance with the solicitation of the author. He is a respectable inhabitant of this town. The constant exercise of his mind on religious topics, has, it is thought by many of his friends, affected the sanity of his mind; on every other subject, he appears entirely rational.—Ed. Herald.

Remarkable Vision and Revelation: As seen and received by Asa Wild, of Amsterdam, (N.Y.)

Having a number of months enjoyed an unusual degree of the light of God's countenance, and having been much fa. . . [one line missing] . . . after having enjoyed the sweetest, and most soul ravishing communions with Him; the Lord in his boundless goodness was pleased to communicate the following Revelation, having in the first place presented me with a very glorious Vision, in which I saw the same things:

In the first place I observe that my mind had been brought into the most profound stillness, silence and awe; realizing in a remarkable manner the majesty, presence and glory of that Being before whom all nations are as the drop of the bucket. It seemed as if my mind, though active in its very nature, had lost all its activity, and was struck motionless, as well as into nothing, before the awful and glorious majest of the Great Jehovah. He then spake to the following purpose; and in such a manner as I could not describe if I should attempt-- He told me that the Millenium state of the world is about to take place; that in seven years literally, there would scarce a sinner be found on earth: that earth itself, as well as the souls and bodies of its inhabitants, should be redeemed, as before the fall, and become as the garden of Eden. He told me that all the most dreadful and terrible judgments spoken of in the blessed scriptures, were to be executed within that time; that more than two thirds of the inhabitants of the world would be destroyed by these judgments: some of which are the following-- wars massacres; famines; pestilence; earthquakes; civil, politicl, and ecclesiastical commotions; and above all, various and dreadful judgments executed immediately by God, thorough the instrumentality of the Ministers of the Millenial dispensation; which is to exceed in glory every other dispensation; a short description of which may be seen in the last chapter of Isaiah, and in other places. He also told me, that every denomination of professing christians had become extremely corrupt; many of which had never had any true faith at all; but are guided only by depraved reason, refusing the teaching of that Spirit which indited the scriptures, and which alone can teach us the true meaning of the same; even as the diamond alone can cut its fellow. He told me further, that he had raised up, and was now raising up, that class of persons signified by the Angel mentioned in by the Revelator, xiv. 6, 7, which flew in the midst of heaven; having the everlasting gospel to preach; that these persons are of an inferior class, and small learning; that they will be rejected by every denomination as a body; that soon, God will open their way, by miracles, judgments, &c, that they will have higher authority, greater power, superior inspiration, and a greater degree of holiness, than was ever experienced before: inasmuch as this is far the most glorious dispensation of divine grace and glory. Furthermore he said that all the different denominations of professing christians, constituted the New Testament Babylon; and that he should deal with them according to what is written of IT, in the book of Revelation; that he is about to call out all his sincere children, who are mourning in Zion, from the oppression of the tyranny of this mother of harlots; and that the severest judgments will be inflicted on the false and fallen professors of religion; which will immediately commence in Amsterdam, and has already commenced in different parts of the world, and even in this country. And though their operations at first are gradual, and under cover, yet it will soon be generally seen that it is the immediate execution of divine vengeance upon an ungodly world.

Much more the Lord revealed, but forbids my relating it in this way. But this, I have written and published, by the express and immediate command of God: the truth and reality of which, I know with the most absolute certainty.-- though I have ever been the most backward to believe things of this nature; having been brought up in the Calvinistic system, and having had a thorough understanding of the same, and was fully established in the belief of it for several years after I experienced the love of God in my heart: but finding the Calvinists did not understand the glorious depths of holiness, and conformity to the divine character in heart and practice, which I saw was our privilege and duty, I joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, which I found had much clearer and more scriptural views on these and some other points than the Calvinists; though I soon saw that they as a body, were very corrupt, having departed from their primitive purity and holiness. I also saw that their first founders did not travel into all that was their privilege; and that vastly greater depths of holiness might have been experienced, even by them.
Yet I thank God for what light I have received through their instrumentality, but know that much greater and more glorious light is about to burst upon the world.

Amsterdam, October, 1823.

N. B. Printers of Newspapers and periodical publications are requested to insert the above.

I further observe, that I shall soon publish, in a cheap pamphlet, my religious experience and travel in the divine life, with a more full account of the truths above written, and many other things connected with them.

Methodists are primitivists meaning they seek to order their sect after the apostolic church of the New Testament. Wilson's work examines Methodist interpretations of New Testament beliefs and practices and their implementation in the Methodist Church.

These passages discuss differences in priesthood and ecclesiastical structure in the apostolic church and current Methodist Episcopal Church. Wilson alleges that the apostles possessed the ability to work miracles and preach with extraordinary power and that they were divinely inspired to institute laws and ecclesiastical structures as they did. However, Wilson believes that after the apostolic period, these gifts ceased to be. Evil bishops perverted the true democratic and universal government established by the apostles and set about concentrating authority in the hands of a religious elite. However, Wilson seems to believe that even without those evil persons who infiltrated the ministry in the second century, apostolic gifts would not have been handed down to later generations. Those divine gifts were unique to the apostolic period. After the apostles had converted a core Christian community which would assure the survival of Christianity, miracles and extraordinary preaching ceased because then ordinary preaching alone could convert followers. Methodism like other Protestant denominations sees itself as one of a number of true churches. Presumably the "true church" would be the one established by the Savior and his apostles; however, sparse information in the New Testament about that original Christian church leaves much up to interpretation for these sects.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): "Concerning the different orders, in the Christian church, Mr. Wesley thus observes, "It was necessary, first, to appoint extraordinary teachers, who should erect everywhere Christian assemblies; and then to establish ordinary ministers; for the best system of religion must necessarily dwindle to nothing, or be egregiously corrupted, if not perpetually inculcated by a regular and standing ministry. The extraordinary teachers were the Apostles, Prophets and Evangelists, who for a season, were set in the church; (Ep. iv.ii.) and whole office probably expired with themselves: for as the scriptures no where intimate an intended perpetuity of the officers of this order; so it is evident from the silence of the Ecclesiastical Historian respecting them, in the second century; that they became extinct at a very early period. Those of inferior but permanent order, were denominated Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, for the "rulers of the church were either Presbyters or Bishops;" and at Jerusalem "seven Deacons were chosen, by order of the Apostles, to distribute the offerings of the church, which were for the support of the poor." And "all the other Christian churches followed the example of that of Jerusalem, in whatever related to the choice and office of the Deacons" (22-23)

"But when it is considered, that an Apostle was a "person honoured with a divine commission; invested with the power of making laws, of controlling the wicked when expedient, and of working miracles when necessary, (Matt. xvi.19--John xx.22, 23;) that this authority was paramount to that of all the churches, (1 Cor. vii.17;) his decisions in the spirit, and accompanied by the power of Christ, (1 Cor. v.4;) and that the Apostles when assembled together in council, were instructed in an extraordinary manner by the Holy Ghost: (Acts xv.28.) It will thence most clearly follow, that the Apostles were duly and divinely competent, to construct, and put into operation, the various parts of the foregoing system already ascribed to them; and when the whole forementioned parts and circumstances of that system are taken into view, it will decisively follow, that it was in its origin, truly and properly divine. . . As to the heroes who thus first attacked this divine respository of Ecclesiastical rights and privileges, was the provincial councils, which had their origin in that era. For "these councils, of which we find not the smallest trace before the middle of this (II) century, changed the face of the church: for by them the privileges of the people were diminished, and the authority of the Bishops greatly augmented. At their first appearance in these councils, they acknowledged that they were no more than the delegates of their respective churches. But they imperceptibly extended the limits of their authority, and asserted that Christ had empowered them, to prescribe to his people, authoritative rules of faith and manners. . . And accordingly the Bishops considered themselves as invested with a rank and character similar to those of the high priest amongst the Jews, whilst the Presbyters represented the Priests, and the Deacons the Levites. The errors to which this notion gave rise were many; and one of its immediate consequences, was the establishing a greater difference between the Pastors and their Flocks, than the genius of the gospel seems to admit. Priestcraft having thus artfully insinuated itself into the church. . ." (62-66)

Nature of Source: This is the original Discipline for the Methodist Episcopal Church which was composed at General Conference in 1784 when the MEC was organized. Methodists look to the New Testament and the Discipline as the two infallible sources for their doctrine and ecclesiastical structure. The Discipline contains detailed descriptions of the qualifications for and functions of different ecclesiastical offices and guidelines for Methodist conferences.
Comment: Methodism tried to detheologize religion in the nineteenth century; consequently, Methodist literature of that period devotes little attention to doctrine.
However, baptism of all doctrines is most frequently discussed. This is probably because the Protestant denominations distinguished themselves from each other on this point. Where Baptists required baptism by immersion, Methodists left the mode—sprinkling, pouring, or immersion—up to the person's preference. Additionally, Methodists did not consider baptism essential for salvation where other Protestant denominations did. Therefore, Methodism refers to baptism often in order to justify their liberal position on this matter and disprove other sects as this passage attempts to do.

Excerpts (pages): "In our text, Christ commissions his ministers to baptize the nations. We borrow the word Baptism from the Greeks; among whom it was commonly used to signify a wetting or washing in some mode, as I shall shew more particularly in the sequel. Among Christians, Baptism is that Religious and Sacramental washing with Water, which Christ has appointed as the token and sign of our admission into the visible church, and of our having an interest in the privileges, and coming under the obligations of the gospel covenant.

But there are some, who are not content to enjoy all the liberty in our churches that they can reasonably desire for themselves. With them there is no true baptism without dipping: nor will they have Christian communion with any but those who have gone into the water. According to them, there are no gospel churches in the world, except of those who have been dipped. None are regularly called or sent of God to preach the word, and administer gospel ordinances, till they have been dipped. And thus, as much as in them lies, they unchurch all the churches in the world, except those who agree with them in the mode of baptizing.--They deny the call and mission of their ministers: invalidate and nullify their ordinances: and excommunicate thousands, whom they cannot deny to be eminent for faith and holiness; and, in a word, make the door of the visible church so much narrower than Christ has made the gate of Heaven, that they reject far the greater part of those whom Christ receives. . .

Methinks they have more reason to question the validity of their own administration, than to deny ours, upon the account of such irregularities as they charge upon us. For they cannot deny that the baptism which is administered in their communions was received at first by their predecessors, from the hands of such as, according to their principles, were unbaptized, and consequently could not be regularly authorized to administer the ordinance. If they think sprinkling to be no true baptism, much more have they reason to doubt the validity of immersion, when performed by an unbaptized and unauthorized administrator. And, if the first baptisms of that sect, when they first sprung up, were invalid, how can those administrations be thought valid and regular, which depend upon them?

We must therefore conclude, that dipping cannot be essential to baptism and Christian communion. . .

Let us now make some remarks on the baptism with the Holy Ghost, which is often spoken of. This is indeed a spiritual baptism, by which the subjects of it were sanctified, consecrated, and separated to God, in a higher and more eminent sense, than those were who had only been consecrated by water baptism.

The holy oil, with which persons were anointed in their consecration, was a sign or emblem of the Holy Spirit given to them, to fit them for the offices to which they were called. The same also is signified by the Christian baptism. Now, it is by the pouring on of the oil that persons are anointed; and it is by pouring out of the Spirit upon us, that our anointing or baptism with the Holy Ghost is expressed. As therefore baptism answers in signification to anointing, we may well conclude, that it may properly be administered in the same way, that is, by affusion."

Descent from Israel

I. British-Israelism Before the Death of Joseph Smith

The idea that Christian Europeans and Americans might be of Israelite descent would not have been foreign to many of Joseph Smith's contemporaries. Explicit connections between the lost tribes of Israel and the British and Scottish had been made centuries before Joseph's time. The doctrine linking these groups was later known as Anglo-Israelism or British-Israelism. British-Israelism, in its fully developed form, identified the British nation with the Israelite tribe of Ephraim. But this fully developed British-Israelism is not known to have appeared until the 1800s.

However, a sort of proto-British-Israelism manifested itself in medieval and early modern times in the form of legends linking the inhabitants of the British Isles to the peoples of the Old Testament. These legends variously identified Britain as the land of the Biblical patriarchs, declared their kings to be the heirs of a sacred stone spoken of Genesis ("Jacob's pillow"), or made them out to be the heirs of the secrets of Solomon's temple. The creators of these legends apparently wanted to find some way to tie Britain to the biblical narrative and thereby give Britain a sacred history and a place in the divine plan.

A similar desire may have motivated 17th Century politician and hebraist John Sadler to develop the earliest known manifestation of British-Israelism. Sadler reasoned that similarities between the British legal system and the Mosaic law were best explained by the theory that the British were, in fact, Israel's lost tribes. Sadler, a philo-semite, published his theory in 1649 in order to motivate his countrymen to allow their Jewish "kin" back into the country after they were expelled.

British-Israel ideas may have also been taught in the 17th Century by Queen Elizabeth's "magician" John Dee. According to one scholar, Dee's doctrine that the British were really the lost tribes provided the major justification for the expansion of the British Empire.

In spite of its deep roots in British culture, British-Israelism found few vocal supporters in the 18th Century. But in 1794, self-proclaimed prophet-king, Richard Brothers, breathed new life into the idea. Brothers claimed he could discern the tribal lineages of his fellow Britons by revelation. He is known to have identified several of his contemporaries as descendants of Judah and David and others as descendants of Joseph.

After Brothers' initial writings, British-Israelism spread rapidly. In the first few decades of the 19th Century several authors began championing British-Israelism. The renewed interest in British-Israelism created by these writers may have been further stimulated by the arrival of Mormon missionaries in 1836. These missionaries apparently brought with them the idea that many of the British were descendants of Ephraim. This same idea appeared in what may be regarded the founding document of modern British-Israelism, John Wilson's 1844 Our Israelitish Origin.
Wilson used a number of historical and scriptural arguments to prove that the British were the tribe of Ephraim. He argued that the ten tribes were "lost" in the same general area north of Assyria where the Saxons originated. He used Bible passages to show that Ephraim had mixed with the Gentile nations, especially the ancestors of the British. And he showed that the most literal translation of Jacob's blessing to Ephraim in Genesis 48 is "his seed shall become the fulness of the Gentiles." This passage indicated to Wilson that Ephraim was so mixed with the Gentile nations - especially Britain - that a latter-day Ephraimite could be described with equal propriety as an Israelite or a Gentile. Wilson's book was not published in the United States until 1850, but earlier forms of British-Israelism had crossed the Atlantic a good deal earlier.

The New England Puritans, from whom Joseph Smith descended, identified themselves closely with ancient Israel. The Puritans did not count the ancient Israelites among their blood ancestors, but they did regard them as spiritual forebears. It has been argued that this sense that they were Israelites in spirit prepared New Englanders for the even more radical notion that they were Israelites in fact.

This more radical notion gained New England adherents while the Joseph Smith, Sr. family resided in Vermont. One of Richard Brothers' works was apparently popular there. It was picked up by two separate New England publishers in 1795. Around this same time, Nathaniel Wood, who lived within ten miles of the Cowderys and within fifty miles of the Smiths, announced that he and his followers were descendants of the ancient Israel. Like Brothers before him and LDS patriarchs after him, Wood claimed he could discern an individual's tribal lineage by revelation.

Wood's sect came to a dramatic end in 1801, when his apocalyptic prophecies failed and his neighbors attempted to shoot him. The melodramatic end that befell the Wood sect could not have remained unknown to either the Cowderys or the Smiths. Indeed, it has been argued that both the Cowderys and the Smiths were involved in the so called "Wood scrape."

II. Early Mormon Notions of Descent from Israel

The early Latter-day Saints held beliefs about Israel that distinguished them from most of their Christian neighbors. While some 19th Century Christians believed themselves to be descendants of Israel, most did not. In fact, many Christians of Joseph Smith's time believed that biblical Israel had been rejected by God and superseded by the New Israel - the Christian Church.

Mormons, by contrast, believed from the beginning that God would fulfil His promises to the literal descendants of ancient Israel, including the Jews, the Lamanites, and the "lost tribes." And, after the mid-1830s, they held to a doctrine that Joseph Smith, the Latter-day Saints generally, and many Europeans, especially the British, were literal descendants of one of the lost tribes: Ephraim. This doctrine did not spring full-blown from the pages of the Book of Mormon, rather, it developed in a piecemeal, but rapid, fashion during the first few years of the Church.

The Book of Mormon seems ambivalent on this doctrine. Although 2 Nephi 3 identifies Joseph Smith as a descendant of Ephraim's father, Joseph of Egypt, the Title Page of the Book of Mormon refers Joseph Smith him as a Gentile. These passages can be reconciled by John Wilson's argument that Joseph's descendants interbred so thoroughly with the Gentiles that they could be called Gentiles themselves. But other Book of Mormon passages are not so easily reconciled with later LDS teachings regarding Israel.

The Book of Mormon writers, for instance, believed that the Latter-day church would be composed largely of Gentiles. These Gentiles, the Book of Mormon claims, can only inherit the blessings of Israel if they accept the Book of Mormon and are "numbered among" or adopted into, the lineage of the Lamanites, who are descendants of Manasseh (1 Ne. 14:2; 2 Ne. 10:18-19; 3 Ne. 16:43; 18:31; 21:16; and 21:22). Thus, in the Book of Mormon view, Joseph Smith was part Josephite and part Gentile, but the latter-day church generally is constituted of pure Gentiles who share Israel's covenant only through adoption.

In August 1830, over a year after he completed the translation of the Book of Mormon, Joseph received a revelation which identified Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph as his ancestors. But Joseph was no longer the only known Israelite in the Church: the revelation also identified Oliver Cowdery as a descendant of these same biblical patriarchs (D&C 27:8-10). Significantly, the revelation also makes reference to Ephraim. It refers to the Book of Mormon as "the stick of Ephraim," an odd denomination for a book written by the descendants of Manasseh (D&C 27:5).

The following year two revelations expanded the latter-day Israelite lineage to include, not only Joseph and Oliver, but also the Latter-day Saints generally (D&C 64:36; 133:30,32,34). While broader in who they include, these revelations are more narrow in the lineage they describe. These revelations do not merely link the Latter-day Saints with Israel or Joseph, they identify the Saints as Ephraim specifically. These revelations linking them to Ephraim allowed the Saints to locate their ancestors in biblical history and themselves in biblical prophecy. It gave them what the medieval British legend-makers and earliest British-Israelists had tried to create for themselves: a sacred history and a place in God's plan.

Three years after these revelations, according to the reminiscent account of Edward Stevenson, Joseph Smith began linking Ephraim, not only with the Saints, but also with the Britain and the surrounding nations. According to Stevenson, Joseph said, "There are thousands of good people in England and those old countries who are waiting for the fulness of the gospel, and it will not be long before they will flock to Zion, for Ephraim dwells largely in those parts." Joseph taught the same doctrine five years later in a letter to Isaac Galland, so Stevenson's reminiscence is probably correct so far as the content of Joseph's statement is concerned. If Stevenson was also correct regarding the timing of the statement, then Joseph Smith linked the British with Ephraim before he sent missionaries to Britain - and his linking these two groups may be one of the reasons why he sent missionaries to Britain so early in the Church's development.

Perhaps the growth of British-Israelism in Britain was nourished by the missionaries Joseph sent there. Allegedly, John Wilson's identification of the British with Ephraim occurred in about 1840, while members of the Twelve were in Manchester hoping "to find some of the blood of Ephraim."

To properly assess Joseph Smith's relationship to British-Israelism it is necessary to answer the question of whether the idea that the British were of Ephraim was present in Joseph Smith's immediate environment in the early 1830s. If this question can be answered, it may be possible to determine whether Joseph Smith's thought was influenced by early British-Israelism, or Joseph's thought and British-Israelism accidentally developed along similar lines, or whether British-Israelists ought to claim Joseph Smith as one of the key figures in their movement - the one who first identified the British with Ephraim.

Nature of Source: Matthew Simpson's cyclopaedia is a comprehensive work describing important Methodist persons, ordinances, and conferences.
Comment: This passage sums up the Methodist view of baptism. Though published in 1878, as far as I can tell Methodists held this same view at the beginning of the nineteenth century as well. Methodists regarded baptism as an important ordinance insofar as it measured a person's obedience and signified his willingness to join the institutional church. However, baptism was not consided to be essential for salvation. A person could be baptized by sprinkling, pouring, or immersion according to his preference. In addition, quite surprisingly, the passage stipulates that laity can baptize in the absence of an ordained minister. Since baptism is not essential for salvation, one can only wonder what situations would necessitate immediate baptism. The provision instead reveals more about the little authority thought to be held by those ordained.

Excerpts (pages): "The mode of baptism has given rise to much controversy. It has been administered by sprinkling, pouring, and immersion; and the various bodies of Baptists contend for immersion as the only valid form. . .The various branches of the Methodist family. . .deny that immersion is essential to the validity of baptism, and accept either mode as valid; believing that the essential element is simply the application of water in the name of the blessed Trinity as an emblem or symbol, as well as an attestation of the faith of the party, or of the parents. The general practice of the Methodist churches is to administer by sprinkling or pouring, as being in full harmony with the affusion of the Holy Spirit, and as being more convenient in its administration.
At the same time, whenever the person to be baptized desires immersion, the church directs that his wishes shall be complied with. The ordinance is administered to all adult persons, who repent of their sins and renounce the world, and profess faith in Christ as their Savior. It also recognizes the divine and ecclesiastical authority for infant baptism, and teaches that parents should conscript their children in this way to the service of Christ, as an expression of their faith, and a covenant on their part to train the children in Christian knowledge and duties. These churches also teach that the administration of the ordinance of baptism is a function of the ministerial office, and it is only in extreme cases that it is proper for lay persons to baptize. The validity of lay baptism under extreme circumstances, and performed with a true intent, in the name of the Trinity, is recognized by the church, and it is not repeated. In the baptismal ceremony the Methodist Churches do not recognize sponsors or god-fathers, as is the custom in the Roman Catholic Church, and in the Church of England. So Christian baptism indicates the renouncing of all evil practices, the commencement of a new and holy life, and is the ceremony of admission into the privileges and fellowship of the Christian church."
success should decide the question: he will take his remarks from the first scripture he lands on. If he preaches easily and well, he will know God called him to the work. Keith does preach at "liberty."

Keith's account of his desire to join the ministry; qualms about if and from whom the call came; and sense that his performance validated the call as real and divine, recur again and again in the autobiographies of Protestant ministers.

Excerpts (pages): "At a certain time there came a local preacher to the house where I lived, and in the course of the religious conversation which passed, he related his call to the ministry. At the same time there fell on my mind such an impression that it was my duty to preach, that I was obliged to leave the room to prevent the discovery of my feelings. I supposed it a temptation, therefore I resisted it. But from the time the conviction followed me by night and by day, until I became so wearied with it that I said in my heart, "surely strangling is better than life."-Job 7.15. I earnestly intreated the Lord, either to remove these trials or take me out of the world. At this time I had told no person my trials about preaching. But one day as I was walking in company with J. Newman, he told the exercises of those who were called of God to preach. Astonished that he should know how to relate all the feelings of my heart, I confessed it all to him."

"While I was on this circuit I began to doubt whether it was my duty to preach. One day as I was going to my appointment, I concluded to preach that day from the first verse I should open to after singing and prayer, let it be what it would, and if I had liberty I would take it for a sign that I ought to preach. I went to the place, and after singing and prayer, I opened to the 45th Psalm and 13th verse. I read it in the presence of the people, and had great liberty in preaching. Then I began to think I could preach well enough"

Gorrie's work discusses Methodist polity and some explanation for particular beliefs and practices.

Comment: Describes the Methodist system of conferences which had existed since Methodism's beginnings. The quarterly conference emerged first followed by the annual and finally the general conference. Though the number and kinds of conferences fluctuated in the Methodist Church before 1792, after that date conference patterns stabilized and the three-tier conference structure emerged as established tradition. Methodist conferences epitomize the church's democratic aims. Because Methodists believed God had ceased to speak to man--He no longer revealed His will to them through inspiration--a single or small group of divinely inspired people could not make decisions for the church at large. Instead, Methodist conferences were as inclusive as possible because only through large-scale rational debate could a correct decision be reached for the church. The early Mormon Church may have relied upon the Methodist precedent for their early conference structures. However, where Methodist conferences primarily administrated church polity--though revivals came to be attached to these legislative meetings--Mormon ones evolved as instructional meetings rather than governing agencies. Instead, early Mormons vested governing authority in councils--smaller, geographically-based bodies.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): "The Annual Conference is composed of all the travelling preachers in full connection, within its bounds, each of whom has an equal voice in the transaction of business. A bishop, by virtue of his office, is the president of the conference, but in case of necessary absence, he may appoint a substitute from among the presiding elders, or if he fails to do so, the conference may appoint its own president from among the same.

The bishops appoint the time of holding the conferences, and must allow each conference to sit a week, at least; the conference appoints the place of its session, which is usually done by accepting some one of the numerous applications sent us by Societies, and quarterly conferences.

The business of an annual conference is, to admit preachers on trial; receive preachers into full connection; elect travelling and local preachers to deacons' and elders' orders'; grant locations; and supernumerary and superannuated relations to those who apply; examine the character of each preacher by calling their names over before the conference, and inquiring if there are any objections to them; to try and expel preachers, if need be, and hear appeals from suspended or expelled local preachers; to receive reports from all the preachers, of the amounts raised for their salaries, and of the amount of money raised for worn-out preachers, widows, and orphans; for the cause of missions, tracts, the American Bible Society, the Sunday School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, or any other purpose for which collections have been ordered by the conference, of for which the Discipline provides.

The session of an annual conference extends from five to ten days, according to the number of members belonging to it, and the amount of business to be transacted. The largest number in any one conference is two hundred and eighty-three and the smallest number is fifty-one."
"A Quarterly Conference is composed of all the traveling and local preachers, exhorters, stewards, and leaders on any circuit or station. There are usually one or two travelling preachers, from one to six or eight local preachers, one or more exhorters, seven stewards, and from five to twenty or more class-leaders, belonging to each quarterly conference. The presiding elder of the district is the president thereof, or, in case of absence, the preacher in charge is the responsible president. The quarterly conference meets four times in the year, and may adjourn from day to day till its business is finished but cannot adjourn to a distant day for that purpose. The presiding elder appoints the time of holding the quarterly conference, but the conference appoints the place of its own sittings. The business of the conference is ordinarily despatched in the course of a few hours.

It is the business of the quarterly conference to hear complaints against local preachers, and to receive and try appeals from expelled members; to superintend the interests of Sunday School within its bounds; to estimate by a committee the amount necessary to be raised for fuel and table expenses of the travelling preacher or preachers of the circuit or station; to take cognizance of all the local preachers and exhorters; to appoint stewards, the preacher in charge having the right to nominate; to grant licenses to preacher; to recommend the renewal of exhorters' licenses; to recommend to the annual conference suitable persons for admission on trial in the annual conference; to recommend suitable persons to be ordained as local deacons and elders; to recommend the re-admission of located elders and deacons to an annual conference; to appoint a recording steward to keep all the records of the quarterly conference; to appoint a district steward to meet in convention and estimate the amount necessary to be raised for the fuel and table expenses, house-rent, &c., of the presiding elder; to advise the action of trustees, and take all such steps for the well-being of the church or churches within its bounds, as shall be deemed expedient and right.

In all questions of law, the presiding elder shall be the judge, subject to an appeal to the president of the next annual conference, but the application of law shall remain with the quarterly conference.

Library Location: American Periodicals Series, Microfilm Reel 1574, BYU Library
Nature of Source: Zion's Herald is a weekly, regional Methodist journal dedicated to discussions of art, science, and religion, though the journal (as might be expected) contains overtly religious overtones and seldom veers from distinctly religious subjects. Includes reports of Quarterly and Annual Conferences and various church committees. Later issues frequently address popular questions of abolition and temperance.

Comment: In his letter to the editor, the unidentified author proposes that Love-Feasts, the Methodist version of the Mormon testimony meeting, be coupled with fasting to increase the outpouring of the Spirit felt at the meetings. This proposal to combine the two resembles Mormon couplings of fasting and bearing of testimony in monthly Fast and Testimony Meetings.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): "Now as often as the Quarterly Meeting is appointed, let the Fast be appointed, with directions respecting a proper observance, and instructions of its importance, as a means of grace to conquer remaining corruptions--to be raised from a state of spiritual languor, to grow in the divine life; to retain the work of God already wrought in the soul, and to prepare for the due celebration of the Love-Feast. Let suitable directions be given to observe the day of fasting as far as the circumstances of the church will admit, as a special day of prayer--of visiting the closet oftener than usual for the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and for God's blessing upon the Feast of love. Let a prayer-meeting be appointed either during the same day, or in the evening, for the particular purpose of imploring the outpouring of the Spirit on the Love-Feast, and that it may prove to be a pentecostal season. Oh! what might we not expect, if some such means were pursued, and pursued uniformly?" (p. 150, col. 3)

Comment: Outline of Methodist reasons for continued implementation of practice of infant baptism. Methodists believe infants not held accountable for sin of Adam as the Catholics do and therefore infant baptism is not implemented for the sake of expiating the sins of our first parents. However, the practice is maintained for other reasons. Primitivism, the continuation of the Apostolic order, in which infant baptism replaces Jewish practice of infant circumcision given as one reason for the ordinance. Also, infant baptism is considered a covenant between child and God (though technically a covenant is a two-way promise and obviously the infant lacks the ability to choose to make or to keep the covenant creating apparent difficulties in religious definition) and a covenant between the parent and God to teach the child theological doctrine. Although as observed the baby has no choice in his baptism, the infant baptismal covenant in the Methodist denomination functions in certain respects like the Mormon temple marriage covenants which confer certain blessings upon those born into the covenant through no act on the part of the child born of the union. Baptized babies receive certain blessings through the ordinance performed under the direction of their parents. Like circumcision, infant baptism distinguishes those children of obedient parents and, if not born into the covenant as Mormon children of sealed parents are, Methodist children are quickly made a part of that covenant after birth through infant baptism. Because children are included in the Lord's promises made to ancient prophets to bless their posterity, they must undergo for Methodists the rite of baptism as the adults do to receive part in those blessings.

Excerpts (pages): "The 17th Article of our Church declares that 'the baptism of young children is to be retained in the Church.' And why is this? For several very important reasons.

1. Because children were admitted into the church under the Patriarchal dispensation, and this by the rite of circumcision, which they received as a sign and seal of the covenant which God made with Abraham; which covenant was, on the part of God, 'I will be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee,' and on the part of Abraham as an acceptance of this gracious offer, by faith, adopting circumcision, as before expressed, as a sign and seal of the same. And as the promise included children, so must the rite, which was a sign of the acceptance of that promise.

2. Because the same practice was continued under the Mosaic dispensation, and for the same reasons. And here it was so strongly insisted upon, that it was threatened that the child who was not circumcised should 'be cut off from among his people.' An awful consideration. And it was in a great measure owing to the observance of this rite, that the visible, organized union of the Jewish church was preserved amid surrounding corruption and idolatry, during the fourteen centuries which intervened from Moses to Christ, and all the important events which were connected to it.

3. Because the church in all ages, is the same; and our Lord and his Apostles never dropped so much as an intimation, that children were to be excluded from the church under the new dispensation; so far from it, that the general precepts and practice of both, very distinctly recognized the same practice to be observed under the Gospel dispensation, as under the two former. As our Savior's taking little children in his arms and blessing them, and declaring that of such is the kingdom of heaven. And in the very first gospel sermon, the people were told that 'the promise was unto them, and declaring that of such is the kingdom of heaven. And in the very first gospel sermon, the people were told that 'the promise was unto them and to their children,' Acts ii. 39; which is precisely the same that was made to Abraham, Gen. xvii.5-14; and which, if Peter had not designed their children should be baptized with them, must have had a tendency to deceive a Jewish mind, in this respect. And again, we find that it was the practice of the Apostles after the manner of the synagogue, to baptize the households of those who believed.

4. This has been the uniform practice of the Christian church in all ages. The different branches of the whole Eastern and Western church, notwithstanding their various differences in other respects, have all agreed in this. And I challenge any man to tell me, if he can, how that great body of the church, in both the East and West, could have been kept together for these eighteen centuries, but in this way. Let it be remembered, that infant baptism is practised by the church universal, except the few Baptist sects in Europe and America, who are not only modern in their origins, but who also constitute but a very small minority of the church, and were never placed, as others have been, in a situation to test the real strength and utility of their system of exclusion.

5. We believe, according to the words of our Saviour before quoted, and St. Paul, Rom. v. 18, that infants are born in a state of justification, having never committed any sin,--and not being accountable for that of Adam,--and consequently if they die in infancy, will be sanctified by the Holy Ghost even as adult believers, and taken to heaven. And if by the grace of God they are heirs of glory, and may be made members of the church triumphant, who, if their parents are believers, has a right to refuse them a place in the church militant; especially as the apostle, in I Cor. vii. 14, declares, that the children of such are 'holy?'

6. We observe that the baptism of children is attended with the most beneficial effects: 1. It introduces them into covenant relation to God. He is then their God, and they, of course, are heirs of all the invaluable blessings of that holy covenant. What parent would shut his children out? 2. Parents who baptize their children, then enter into covenant with God and the church, to 'train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;' and when this is properly done, their conversion to God never fails: Prov. xxii.6. And 3. It is observed that in some of the revivals in Pedobaptist churches, the greatest part of the converts are baptized children. Numerous instances of this might be adduced. And lastly, the knowledge of the fact, that he has been baptized, exerts a controlling influence upon the mind of a child who has been properly instructed, even before he is fully brought to God; a striking instance of which was lately related in one of our religious, in the case of a poor Indian boy, who, when tempted to sin, replied that he had been baptized, which he thought quite a sufficient reason, as it indeed was, why he should not comply.

And now, Mr. Editor, I would inquire why this part of our creed is so set at nought by the great body of our preachers and people in New England? If it is well founded, as I have attempted to prove, why is it so neglected? If it is not correct, why is it not expunged? Why is it permitted to remain there, a dead letter? I never heard but one sermon preached upon this subject by a Methodist minister in my whole life. Our periodicals are equally culpable, maintaining the silence of death upon the subject. The consequence is, there are but very few baptized children in all our societies in New England, the sad and desolating effects of which are everywhere visible. My heart bleeds and I am covered with shame and confusion for our church, when I think of it. Why do not our Quarterly and Annual Conferences take this matter in hand, refusing to license or ordain any preachers, who do not believe in, and practice this part of our church economy? S.W.C."

Nature of Source: The periodical contains primarily transcriptions of sermons on a variety of theological and organizational topics, frequently including those sermons delivered at Methodist Quarterly or Annual Conferences. Largely theological, the periodical devotes considerable space to defending its beliefs and practices from attack.
Comment: This is such an excellent summary in a primary source of the Methodist itinerant system that I have excerpted a large portion of the six page article. Methodists believed in an ecclesiastical structure for lay preaching where traveling ministers moved continuously among the stations of a circuit preaching. Because their full-time service and constant mobility prevented them from holding secular employment, the church supported its itinerant preachers with a stipend. Turner's 1888 work on Methodist polity cites the Old Testament reference to the Israelite practice of paying one tenth of their increase as a precedent for Methodists who collect financial donations from members to support the ministry. Though Methodists would probably not refer to these collections as tithing per se, they at least see a Biblical antecedent for their contributions. When a traveling preacher cannot be present at a station meeting, the local ministry fills in. The local ministry do not receive a stipend and are expected to support themselves financially.

Excerpts (pages):
"Reverend Sir,

Your letter was handed to me two days past. The sketch requested shall be freely given. Some preliminary remarks may be necessary to render it more explicit. And first, we have been accused of incorrect statements, by publishing the additions to our society without subtracting the loss of numbers by death, expulsions, removals, &c. This is not true. Our census is in answer to this question. "What numbers are in society?" The answer is usually given by each minister in charge, taken from the church records; and the dead, &c. make no part of the numbers returned.

Secondly; The term "Society," in the religious vocabulary of Connecticut, means all who attend on the stated ministry of the word. This is not our sense of the word "Society;" but by it, as used in our annual minutes, we mean only those who have joined our communion; and though the first six months of their standing is probationary, yet they are not during that time denied any of the privileges of our church.
Thirdly; As our circuits and stations are not governed by state or parish lines, an exact account for any particular state might be a difficult task; but as I have been twenty-four years a member of the Methodist travelling ministry, and above thirty years a communicant in the Methodist Episcopal Church: and as I have preaching in almost all parts of the state, and feeling interested, as a native of the state, for the prosperity of Methodism therin, I hope I shall be able to give a satisfactory answer to your request.

It is somewhat more than thirty years since that venerable minister of Christ, Rev. Jesse Lee, a native of Virginia, and a member of our travelling ministry, after much solicitation, obtained from Bishop Asbury and his brethren in the ministry, liberty to visit the citizens of New England, to whom he preached a free and a full salvation in the name of Christ. A man of such plain address, and simplicity of style and manners, seemed very unlikely to succeed in so arduous an enterprise. He had not those qualifications which are derived from erudition, nor no studied sermons previously prepared to command the admiration of an audience. How then did he recommend himself to the people? Answer, his love to God and to the souls of men, and a divine unction in his sermons, gave evidence of his commission to proclaim salvation in the name of Jesus. . .

It was thus he began his labours of love in the western towns of the state of Connecticut. After forming some societies in various places, sufficient for the outlines of a circuit, he wrote for a Methodist preacher to supply his place, that he might carry the glad tidings of the gospel further eastward; and he accordingly formed another circuit, and sent for a fellow labourer to aid him in this extensive work. . .

Our Church, which was organized in Baltimore, in the year 1784, according to the Episcopal form, is compacted together throughout the United States, Territories, and Canadas, by a Quadrennial General Conference, and by sectional annual conferences, these are divided into districts, and subdivided into circuits and stations, all connected together under one uniform system of discipline; having in each circuit and station, a quarterly conference, consisting of the ministry, travelling and local, of the class-leaders, exhorters and stewards of the circuit or station. This is the court of appeals both for members who plead unjust expulsion; and the minister in charge, if he differ in judgment from the members of his charge, in condemning or acquitting an accused member of the church. From this body comes the recommendation of the candidate for the local ministry to the conference of local ministers, who in each district have their annual conference, the license of said candidate can only be obtained by the examination and approbation of local ministers, comes the recommendation of the candidate for the travelling ministry, to the conference of travelling ministers, and his reception depends on their inquiry, examination, and vote: and he, after admission, must serve a probation of two years in circuits as a preacher, before he can be received as a member of the travelling ministry, and admitted to the order of a deacon; two years more in ministerial labour is necessary to his admission into the full ministry, which he can only receive by the election of a majority of ministers composing the annual conference, and ordination by the laying on of the hands of a bishop, assisted by some of the elders.

New-Haven, New-London, and Middletown, are the only places in this state which have the continued weekly services of a stationed minister; Hartford it is expected will be added to the list this year: the rest of our societies in this state are supplied by circuit ministers, who generally supply each congregation with a sermon once in two weeks, and sometimes oftener; the local ministry usually fill the intermediate sabbath; or if the appointment be on another day, and it is inconvenient for the local minister to attend, then the sabbath is occupied by prayer and exhortation, by some of the lay-members. Local ministry usually derive their support from their own industry, and preach on sabbaths or other times as they are able. They are eligible to deacon's orders after four years service as local preachers; and after four years faithful exercise of the deacon's office, they are eligible to the office of elders. The deacons perform baptism and marriage, and assist the elder in administering the Lord's supper. Our travelling ministry have no secular employment, but give themselves wholly to the service of the sanctuary. They are appointed to a circuit or station, for one year at a time, and may not on any account serve in the same place more than two years before they are changed for others. But the presiding elder, who travels a district, including from six to twelve circuits, is permitted to continue on the same station four years; because he visits each circuit and station in his district usually but once in a quarter. He superintends both the spiritual and temporal affairs of the church, and presides in the quarterly meetings in every circuit and station of his district."

Date of Publication: Wed, Jan. 13, 1836

Nature of Source: Zion's Herald is a weekly, regional Methodist journal dedicated to discussions of art, science, and religion, though the journal (as might be expected) contains overt religious overtones and seldom veers from distinctly religious subjects. Includes reports of Quarterly and Annual Conferences and various church committees. Later issues frequently address popular questions of abolition and temperance.

Comment: Methodist minister Rev. James Culbertson of Zanesville, Ohio, outlines his reasons for refusing the honorary title of D.D. conferred upon him. Note that Joseph Smith's semi-literacy, far from in some way delegitimizing his religious authority, would have been advantageous to many in a religious climate hostile to religious educative elevation which smelt of Catholic Popery.

Excerpts (pages): "1. Because I have long been doubtful, whether such titles were compatible with the Letter of Spirit of Christianity. The Letter is exhibited in such passages as the following.--"Be ye not called of men, Rabbi; for one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

But if we have mistaken the letter, can we be mistaken in the spirit of Christianity? Is it not a lowly, unaspiring, unassuming, unostentatious system? I am far from ascribing pride, ambition, or a love of show to those who wear these honorary titles, for many of them are among the humble and unobtrusive. But, still it is a question, whether these distinctions do not, in the estimation of the world, clothe Christianity in a worldly livery, which does not belong to her.

2. Because these titles, even if strictly compatible with Christian principles, are, in their present application confined to their original and appropriate design. It cannot be doubted they were, originally, intended as the honorary testimonials to eminent attainments. It is equally unquestionable that these titles have stooped, in their requirements below their original demands, and thus have lost their value and sunk their reputation.

3. Because they have become too popular, and are, in this way, ensnaring. This is a delicate point, and I shall not dwell on it.

4. Because the prevalence of these honorary badges in the Church, prejudices acute and discerning men in the world, and creates embarrassment in the efforts of the Church to do good. This is a reason, which I deem of vast importance. We believe as private Christians we unfold, as ministers, a system which calls for crucifixion to the world. What will be the effect, when the world beholds us investing each other with honorary appendages and flattering distinctions? Doubtless it will produce distrust in our honesty, and so far interfere with our usefulness.

5. Because these distinctions partake too much of the character and spirit of Popery, and identify Protestants to too great an extent with the "Man of Sin," encircled with splendid titles. I admit that many, clothed with these honors, have no affinity to the Popish system: but still their position before the public involves too great an assimilation.

Nature of Source: This is the original Discipline for the Methodist Episcopal Church which was composed at General Conference in 1784 when the MEC was organized. Methodists look to the New Testament and the Discipline as the two infallible sources for their doctrine and ecclesiastical structure. The Discipline contains detailed descriptions of the qualifications for and functions of different ecclesiastical offices and guidelines for Methodist conferences.

Comment: This passage outlines the duties for Methodist preachers and the steps by which one becomes a preacher. Note the ascetic, industrious lifestyle demanded of preachers and the stringent though sometimes loose rules which govern them. Because Methodists relied on rational evaluation of candidates rather than revelation, Methodists extend probationary callings to preachers. If a preacher fulfilled his trial period well, he was then received into full fellowship in the ministry. The trial period gave annual conference an opportunity to monitor the probationary preacher's performance. It also gave preachers an opportunity to determine if the ministry was really a suitable career for them. Probationary ministers renewed their licenses yearly at annual conference. Two years for itinerant or four years for local preachers as probationary ministers qualified them for ordination to the deaconate. An additional two or four years usually qualified deacons for ordination to the office of elder.

Excerpts (pages): "Quest. 1. How is a Preacher to be received?

Answ. 1. By the Conference.
2. In the Interval of the Conference, by the Elder.
3. When his Name is not printed in the Minutes, he must receive a written Licence from his Elder.

Quest. 2. What is the Duty of a Preacher?

1. To preach.
2. To meet the Societies of Classes, and Bands.
3. To visit the Sick.
4. To meet the Leaders.
5. To preach in the Morning, where he can get Hearers.

N.B. We are fully determined never to drop Morning-Preaching; and to preach at five o'Clock in the Summer, and at six in the Winter, wherever it is practicable.

Quest. 3. Are the Preachers to read our Liturgy?

Answ. All that have received a written Direction for that Purpose, under the Hand of a Bishop or Elder, may read the Liturgy, as often as they think it expedient.

Quest. 4. What are the Directions given to a preacher?

Answ. Be diligent. Never be unemployed. Never be triflingly employed. Never trifle away Time; neither spend any more Time at any Place than is strictly necessary.
2. Be serious. Let your Motto be, Holiness to the Lord. Avoid all Lightness, jesting and foolish Talking.
3. Converse sparingly and cautiously with Women.
4. Take no Step towards Marriage without first consulting with your Brethren.
5. Believe Evil of no one: Unless you see it done, take Heed how you credit it. Put the best Construction on every Thing. You know the Judge is always supposed to be on the Prisoner's Side.
6. Speak Evil of no one: Else your Word especially would eat as doth a Canker. Keep your Thoughts within your own Breast, till you come to the Person concerned.

7. Tell every one under your Care, what you think wrong in his Conduct and Tempers, and that plainly as soon as may be: Else it will fester in your Heart. Make all Haste to cast the Fire out of your Bosom.

8. Do not affect the Gentleman. You have no more to do with this Character than with that of a Dancing-Master. A Preacher of the Gospel is the Servant of all.

9. Be ashamed of nothing but Sin.

10. Be punctual. Do every Thing exactly at the Time. And do not mend our Rules, but keep them; not for Wrath but Conscience sake.

11. You have nothing to do but to save Souls. Therefore spend and be spent in this Work. And go always not only to those that want, but to those that want you most . . .

12. Act in all Things, not according to your own Will, but as a Son in the Gospel. As such it is your Part to employ your Time in the Manner which we direct: Partly in preaching and visiting from House to House: Partly in reading, Meditation and Prayer. Above all, if you labour with us in our Lord's Vineyard, it is needful you should do that Part of the Work which we advise, at those Times and Places which we judge most for His glory.

Ques. 2. What Method do we use in receiving a Preacher at the Conference?

Ans. After solemn Fasting and Prayer, every Person proposed shall be asked, before the Conference, the following Questions (with any others which may be thought necessary) viz. Have you Faith in Christ? Are you going on to Perfection? Do you expect to be made perfect in Love in this Life? . . . Are you determined to employ all your Time in the Work of God? Will you endeavor not to speak too long or too loud? Will you diligently instruct the Children in every Place? Will you visit from House to House? Will you recommend Fasting or Abstinence, both by Precept and Example? Are you in Debt? We may then, if he gives Satisfaction, receive him as a Probationer, by giving him the Form of Discipline, inscribed thus: "You think it your Duty to call Sinners to Repentance. Make full Proof hereof, and we shall rejoice to receive you as a Fellow-Labourer." Let him then carefully read and weigh what is contained therein; that if he has any Doubt, it may be removed. Observe! Taking on Trial is entirely different from admitting a Preacher. On on Trial, may be either admitted or rejected, without doing him any Wrong; otherwise it would be no Trial at all. Let every Deacon explain this to them that are on Trial.

After two Years Probation, being recommended by the Elder or Deacon, and examined by the Bishop, he may be received into full Connection, by giving him the Form of Discipline, inscribed thus: "As long as you freely consent to, and earnestly endeavor to walk by these Rules, we shall rejoice to acknowledge you as a Fellow-Labourer."

N.B. Let none who are local, preach or exhort in any of our Societies without a Note of Permission from the Deacon: Let every local Preacher or Exhorter take Care to have this renewed yearly: And let every Elder insist upon it.
But it must be remembered that many of us early travelling preachers, who entered the vast wilderness of the West at an early day, had little or no education: no books, and no time to read or study them if we could have had them. We had no colleges, or even a respectable common school, within hundreds of miles of us. Old Dyke or Dilworth was our spelling-book; and what little we did learn, as we grew up, and the means of education increased among us, we found to our hearts' content, that we had to unlearn, and this was the hardest work of all" (v-vi).

"The Presbyterians, and other Calvinistic branches of the Protestant Church, used to contend for an educated ministry, for pews, for instrumental music, for a congregational or stated salaried minister. The Methodists universally opposed these ideas; and the illiterate Methodist preachers actually set the world on fire--the American world, at least--while they were lighting their matches! Methodist preachers were called, by literary gentlemen, illiterate, ignorant babblers. . . I do not wish to undervalue education, but really I have seen so many of these educated preachers who forcibly reminded me of lettuce growing under the shade of a peach-tree, or like a gosling that had got sick and faint. . ."

"I awfully fear for our beloved Methodism. Multiply colleges, universities, seminaries, academies; multiply our agencies, and editorships, and fill them all with our best and most efficient preachers, and you localize the ministry and secularize them too; then farewell to itinerancy; and when this fails we plunge right into congregationalism, and stop precisely where all other denominations started."

Richard Brothers and Joseph Smith

Over the course of this summer's research, the fellows at the Joseph Fielding Smith Institute have found that a number of Joseph Smith's contemporaries shared some of those doctrines we tend to think are unique to the Prophet, such as the doctrine of a Heavenly Mother or the idea of a political kingdom of God. These doctrinal similarities may cause some to wonder whether Joseph Smith should be thought of as unique at all. I would suggest, however, that Joseph Smith's uniqueness cannot be adequately assessed by doctrinal comparison alone. Jan Shipps, Phillip Barlow, Richard T. Hughes, and Richard Bushman have all suggested that Joseph's uniqueness may lie, not so much the absolutely unprecedented nature of his doctrines, but in his reliving of the sacred story contained in the Bible. While his contemporaries expounded Moses, honored David, and discoursed on Elijah, Joseph Smith spoke with God face to face as Moses had, reigned over Israel as David had, and bound on earth and in heaven as Elijah had. Joseph Smith was a Moses, a David, and an Elijah.

But the recapitulation of Biblical narrative was not unique to Joseph Smith. At least one of Joseph's contemporaries, the British millenialist prophet Richard Brothers, also understood himself to be a recapitulation of Moses, David, and Elijah. A review of Brothers' religious career may allow us to assess whether, and in what ways, Joseph Smith was unique.

Richard Brothers was born in Newfoundland on Christmas Day 1757. He later recalled that during he always "had a presentiment of being sometime very great." His father sent him to England for schooling, and at age 14 Richard Brothers received a call, not to prophethood, as Joseph Smith had, but to His Majesty's Navy. At 26 he retired from the Navy and joined the Merchant Marines. At 28 he married and left on a ship the same day. When he returned after years at sea he found his wife already the mother of several children. Rightly suspecting that the children were not his own, Brothers promptly moved to London.

At this time, perhaps with the thought of consoling himself on his losses, Brothers turned his thoughts to religion. He began a careful study and sometimes prayed and fasted for up to three days at a time. Soon he began receiving visions and revelations. His scripture study and religious experiences convinced him to renounce war and refuse the taking of oaths. As a result, Brothers was denied the continuation of his retirement pay, the receipt of which required the taking of an oath.

In 1791 Brothers received a vision of God, Satan, and angels. He also saw the imminent destruction of London and commanded to leave the city. But Brothers, like Moses before him, pleaded with the Lord to spare his people. Brothers reported that the Lord listened to Brothers pleas and decided to postpone his awful judgments.

Brothers' prophetic career now blossomed. He received an increasing volume of revelations. He also made a number of prophecies, some correct, some incorrect, and attempted - unsuccessfully - to heal the blind. Brothers now identified himself more strongly with Moses and even carried with him a staff patterned after Moses' staff. He also reported a revelation at this time informing him that he was a descendant of King David through Jesus' brother, James, and was, therefore, the much-prophesied latter-day David.

In 1794 Brothers published a book entitled A Revealed Knowledge of the Prophecies and Times, which was published in three languages and several different countries. This work announced the imminence of the destruction of the wicked and the restoration of the Jews. The book also displays Brothers' compassion for sinners in its heartfelt calls for repentance.
In the book Brothers identified himself as the latter-day Elijah who would use his control of the heavens to punish the wicked, the prophet like unto Moses who would lead Israel back to Palestine, and the latter-day David who would rule over the restored Israel. The book also warned King George not to continue his plans for war with France and announced to the king that he

Not surprisingly, King George looked askance at Brothers' revelations. In March 1795, Brothers was arrested for violating an ancient and obscure law which forbade "unlawfully, maliciously, and wickedly writing, publishing, and printing fantastical prophecies, with the intent to cause dissension and other disturbances within the realm," a law Joseph Smith's opponents could only have wished was also in the American law books. Brothers' governmental opponents soon had him committed to an asylum.

Brothers, however, was undaunted. He continued writing, laying out detailed plans for the new exodus to Palestine and the building up of a new Jerusalem. He was released in 1806 and spent his later years devising a sacred astronomy, creating a new code of laws for the government of Israel, and advancing his theory that the British are descended from ancient Israel. He died in 1824. But, as late as 1917, one scholar noted that "the believers in Brothers are not yet extinct." Indeed, Brothers British-Israel notions have survived to the present-day and bear a striking resemblance to Joseph Smith's own views on Israel.

More telling than such doctrinal similarities, however, are the similarities and divergences in what we might call the "prophetic practice" of Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers. Brothers diverged from Joseph's prophetic practice by not establishing a church and not acting in a priestly role. But Brothers mirrored Joseph's prophetic practice, at least in part, by attempting to make an inspired revision of numerous Bible passages, by announcing his intention to live plural marriage, and, most significantly, by attempting to recapitulate the lives of several key figures from the Bible. I will now expand on each of these similarities and differences.

Although Richard Brothers gathered an international following by publishing his revelations and prophecies, he never attempted to found a church. His goal was not the establishment of a church, but the restoration of Israel. While Joseph Smith arguably laid greater stress on the restoration of Israel than he did on the establishment of the Church, he saw the building up of the Church as a necessary prerequisite to Israel's restoration. In the matter of founding a church, Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers clearly followed different paths.

Joseph and Brothers also diverged in their exercise of divine authority. While Brothers believed that God had given him awesome political and revelatory authority, he never attempted to serve as a mediator or conduit of divine grace. According to Brothers, it was presumptuous, even blasphemous, to claim special priestly authority to act as God's surrogate in forgiving sins or conferring the Holy Ghost upon others. Nothing could be further from Joseph Smith's doctrine and practice. Joseph's ordinations and revelations empowered him to give the gift of the Holy Ghost, remit sins on earth and in heaven, and even to seal individuals up to eternal life by the Holy Spirit of Promise. Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers paralleled one another more closely, however, in their treatment of the Bible. Thirty-six years before Joseph began his revision or new translation of the King James Bible, Brothers revised hundreds of King James Bible verses which he incorporated into his book God's Awful Warnings to a Giddy, Careless, Sinful World . . . Brothers' revision of the Bible was largely an effort to clarify the language of the King James Version, much of which had already fallen into disuse by Brothers' time. So those of you who have a hard time understanding King James English may take comfort in the fact that it was already archaic two hundred years ago.

Despite the general similarities of the project they undertook, Joseph Smith was bolder than Brothers in making his revision or New Translation of the Bible. Joseph not only clarified the King James text, he also added, or restored, large blocks of previously unknown sacred narrative.

Richard Brothers and Joseph Smith converged in their intention to practice plural marriage. In 1794 Brothers announced that he would someday have seven wives. While this stated intention of Brothers' certainly resonates with Joseph Smith's marital practice, the motives behind Brothers' intended practice of plural marriage and Joseph's actual practice thereof are quite different. Brothers own statements suggest that he decided to live plural marriage in order to fulfill Isaiah 4:1, which states that near the time of the Millenium "seven women shall take hold of one man." Joseph, on the other hand, lived plural marriage because his revelations told him he had to "do the works of Abraham" in order to receive the promise of exaltation Abraham received.

The most significant convergence of the prophetic practice of Richard Brothers with that of Joseph Smith is in his reenactment of the lives of key Biblical figures. As noted above, Brothers, like Joseph Smith, undersood himself to be the latter-day counterpart of Moses, David, and Elijah.

In writing about Joseph Smith, Richard Bushman has noted that it was Joseph's ability to revive the sacred stories of the Bible by reliving them and thereby make a sacred story out of his own life that "was the source of his extraordinary influence." Thus it was in reliving biblical figures that Richard Brothers most nearly approximated what was extraordinary about Joseph Smith.

Yet it is precisely here - from the historian's perspective - that we find the crucial difference between Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers. This crucial difference between Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers is that Brothers only took upon himself the roles of those biblical figures who were explicitly prophesied to have latter-day counterparts while Joseph Smith performed all the sacred roles of biblical history. Richard Brothers saw himself as the long-awaited "prophet like unto Moses," a new Elijah, and a latter-day King David, but Joseph Smith was all of these things and also the patriarch of an endless posterity like Abraham, a High Priest like Aaron and Melchizedek, and even a church-founder like Christ himself. Richard Brothers' goal in reliving the Bible was, apparently, to fulfill specific prophecies; Joseph Smith's goal was to restore all things - to gather the sacred keys, callings, and powers of all dispensations into one grand consummation.

This difference between Joseph Smith and Richard Brothers - that Joseph intended to restore all things while Brothers did not - accounts for the other differences we have noted. The reason Brothers made only cosmetic changes in his Bible revision while Joseph added large blocks of text to his is that Brothers did not understand himself as a restorer of the biblical text while Joseph did. Richard Brothers wanted to live plural marriage in order to fulfill the prophecy of Isaiah, but Joseph lived plural marriage in order to become a latter-day Abraham and thereby obtain for himself the promises God made to Abraham. Brothers did not attempt to mediate divine grace to his followers as Joseph did because, unlike Joseph, he did not see himself as restoring or reliving the Old Testament role of High Priest. And Brothers, unlike Joseph Smith, did not establish a church because he, unlike Joseph, did not see himself in the New Testament role of Church-founder.

In conclusion, my research this summer has impressed me with the understanding that Joseph Smith distinguished himself from his contemporaries, not primarily by teaching entirely unique doctrine, but by reliving the Bible - by being what the biblical figures were. I have also learned that an occasional spiritual maverick like Richard Brothers also attempted to appropriate the roles of key figures from the Bible. But even these mavericks, who seem most similar to Joseph Smith, did not simultaneously recapitulate the lives and perform the sacred callings of all key biblical figures from all dispensations. As the Restoration Joseph Smith effected was a gathering in one of all dispensations, so Joseph himself was a gathering in one of all the sacred callings and divine powers of those dispensations. Joseph was not boasting when he told a Nauvoo congregation, "No man has done such a work as I." There is no one like him.

Comment: Methodist minister Rev. James Culbertson of Zanesville, Ohio, outlines his reasons for refusing the honorary title of D.D. conferred upon him. Note that Joseph Smith's semi-literacy, far from delegitimizing his religious authority, likely would have been advantageous in a religious climate hostile to religious education which smelt of Catholic Popery and was regarded as an impediment to the Spirit.

Excerpts (pages): "1. Because I have long been doubtful, whether such titles were compatible with the Letter of Spirit of Christianity. The Letter is exhibited in such passages as the following.--"Be ye not called of men, Rabbi; for one is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."
But if we have mistaken the letter, can we be mistaken in the spirit of Christianity? Is it not a lowly, unassuming, unpretentious system? I am far from ascribing pride, ambition, or a love of show to those who wear these honorary titles, for many of them are among the humble and unobtrusive. But, still it is a question, whether these distinctions do not, in the estimation of the world, clothe Christianity in a worldly livery, which does not belong to her.
2. Because these titles, even if strictly compatible with Christian principles, are, in their present application confined to their original and appropriate design. It cannot be doubted they were, originally, intended as the honorary testimonials to eminent attainments. It is equally unquestionable that these titles have stooped, in their requirements below their original demands, and thus have lost their value and sunk their reputation.

3. Because they have become too popular, and are, in this way, ensnaring. This is a delicate point, and I shall not dwell on it.

4. Because the prevalence of these honorary badges in the Church, prejudices acute and discerning men in the world, and creates embarrassment in the efforts of the Church to do good. This is a reason, which I deem of vast importance. We believe as private Christians we unfold, as ministers, a system which calls for crucifixion to the world. What will be the effect, when the world beholds us investing each other with honorary appendages and flattering distinctions? Doubtless it will produce distrust in our honesty, and so far interfere with our usefulness.

5. Because these distinctions partake too much of the character and spirit of Popery, and identify Protestants to too great an extent with the "Man of Sin" encircled with splendid titles. I admit that many, clothed with these honors, have no affinity to the Popish system: but still their position before the public involves too great an assimilation.

Title of Book: An Inquiry into the Cause of the Prosperity of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States.

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Sag-Harbor, NY

Publisher: Printed by Alden Spooner

Date of Publication: 1809

Nature of Source: Sowden explains the advantages of the itinerant system of church government which created uniformity of subject preached; unity among different stations; and variety in preachers and styles of address. It curbed corruption in the ministry by keeping the preachers busy. Itinerancy interested parishioner's longer because different preachers gave the Sunday service rather than the same one week after week. In addition, itinerancy helped Methodists achieve equity in the size of the ministers' salaries and in the quality of the preaching each station received. Under itinerancy, a salary cap was set and so ministers were not drawn to settle in wealthy stations in hopes of earning a higher income.

Comment: Nice articulation of what Methodists saw as the advantages of itinerancy.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages):
"To make therefore the best of a small force, the Methodists found it absolutely necessary to adopt the Apostolic plan of itineracy.--This they had tried, and tried with success in the mother country, they were aware of and prepared for the opposition they expected to meet with, for this mode of procedure as it has ever been from the days of Demetrius the shrine maker, down to the present time the sapping of the foundation of priestcraft brought upon them the anathemas of the established order, at home." (30-31)

"We have hitherto treated of itineracy in a general point of view. To prove its reasonableness, and briefly to shew its necessity, has already been attempted; its utility must appear evident to all, and that it has scripture for its basis none I presume will deny; but it never could have answered the valuable purposes it has, had it not been for the best of regularity and gospel order.-- "What! regularity and order among the Methodists?"

Yea verily, for be it known unto thee, friend, and to the world, that the name attached to this sect is exceedingly significant and as applicable as it is pregnant with meaning. And even as it respects the subject now under consideration, (which is though by their opponents the most disorderly of all their proceedings) a travelling methodist preach is as REGULAR in his movements, in his sphere of action, as any local minister possibly can be in his parish. Certainly those gentlemen who have so frequently indulged themselves in censuring the methodists for a want of conformity to the order of the gospel, know but little concerning the gospel plan on which their whole temporal and spiritual economy is founded. They appear not to understand that the whole continent is divided into Circuits, Districts and Conferences; that Circuits form a District, Districts a Conference, and the representatives from the several conferences compose one general conference. They do not know that on circuits are placed from one to four preachers; that over each district is appointed a president Elder, and that over conferences are elected two Superintendents, or (as some prefer calling them) Bishops, the successors of the apostle Wesley.

All these govern according to the power with which they are invested, and move round in a given space of time their several prescribed jurisdictions. And this is what the author of these pages deems proper to term regularity, without which itinerating would be attended with the utmost confusion, but with it, is productive of the most happy effects. In particular it affords a pleasing, edifying variety.

Every man has a sameness both as to manner and matter, and the most popular preacher after being repeatedly heard twice or thrice every Sabbath for years together, is at length heard with less and less concern. But few however deep their knowledge may be, in the things of God or men, in every respect possess gifts adapted to the state and condition of each individual in a single congregation composed of many and very different characters.

The spirit of the settled pastor of long standing is not unfrequently damped by careless inattention of his athenian parishoners, who have become surfeited with the same prayer, the same sermon, the same man, and who ardently desire some new thing. .

"But on the plan of methodistical itinerating, these and such like inconveniences are either in whole or part removed; and particularly so, when we consider that the same preacher is not allowed to travel the same circuit for more than two years successively. . (38)

"Variety alone is not however the only advantage of a well regulated itineracy.--It directly tends to keep those who engage in it alive in the work of the ministry.
It is a point given in both by heathen philosophers and christian divines, that one grand cause of yielding to temptation is idleness, or not being steadily employed in some useful calling." (39)

"From the superintendant down to the graduate for deacon's orders the salary of their preachers, who labor constantly in word and doctrine is the same.--By this means their interest is in every respect a general one.--But destroy the traveling connection and how then how?. . .The largest and most respectable societies would have the ablest divines or in other words the greatest orators--The poor would no longer have the gospel preached unto them--Discipline would be laid aside, and in all probability a diversity of sentiment with regard to important points of doctrine would in the course of a very short space of time take place"

Nature of Source: Peter Cartwright records in his autobiography his experiences as a Methodist minister.

Comment: This passage is a good example of the religious revivalism and enthusiasm in early nineteenth-century America and which would have been a familiar part of the cultural climate of Joseph Smith's day. Cartwright discusses the strange bodily paroxysms of revival attenders including barking, fainting, and the jerks. Cartwright acknowledges that these dramatic displays were sometimes involuntary and sometimes not; however, he believed in most cases they were a judgment sent by God to convert the wicked. Against the most histrionic displays, Cartwright preached vehemently. He especially contradicted people who claimed to have seen visions and had dreams, and prophesied near-distant pre-millennial catastrophe.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): Just in the midst of our controversies on the subject of the powerful exercises among the people under preaching, a new exercise broke out among us, called the jerks, which was overwhelming in its effects upon the bodies and minds of the people. No matter whether they were saints or sinners, they would be taken under a warm song or sermon, and seized with a convulsive jerking all over, which they could not by any possibility avoid, and the more they resisted the more they jerked. If they would not strive against it and pray in good earnest, the jerking would usually abate. I have seen more than five hundred persons jerking at one time in my large congregations. Most usually persons taken with the jerks, to obtain relief, as they said, would rise up and dance. Some would run, but could not get away. Some would resist; on such the jerks were generally very severe.

While I am on this subject I will relate a very serious circumstance which I knew to take place with a man who had the jerks at a camp-meeting. The jerks were very prevalent. There was a company of drunken rowdies who came to interrupt the meeting. These rowdies were headed by a very large drinking man. At length he fetched a very violent jerk, snapped his neck, fell, and soon expired, with his mouth full of cursing and bitterness. I always looked upon the jerks as a judgment sent from God, first, to bring sinners to repentance; and secondly, to show professors that God could work with or without means, and that he could work over and above means.

There is no doubt in my mind that, with weak-minded, ignorant, and superstitious persons, there was a great deal of sympathetic feeling with many that claimed to be under the influence of this jerking exercise; and yet, with many, it was perfectly involuntary. It was, on all occasions, my practice to recommend fervent prayer as a remedy, and it almost universally proved an effectual antidote. There were many other strange and wild exercises into which the subjects of this revival fell; such, for instance, as what was called the running, jumping, barking exercise. The Methodist preachers generally preached against this extravagant wildness. I did it uniformly in my little ministrations, and sometimes gave great offence; but I feared no consequences when I felt my awful responsibilities to wild imaginations of some. They professed to fall into trances and see visions; they would fall at meetings and sometimes at home, and lay apparently motionless and powerless for days, sometimes for a week at a time, without food or drink; and when they came to, they professed to have seen heaven and hell, to have seen God, angels, the devil and the damned; they would prophesy, and under the pretence of Divine inspiration, predict the time of the end of the world, and the ushering in of the great millennium. This was the most troublesome delusion of all; it made such an appeal to the ignorance, superstition, and credulity of the people, even saint as well as sinner. I watched this matter with a vigilant eye. If I opposed it, I would have to meet the clamour of the multitude; and if any one opposed it, these very visionists would single him out, and denounce the dreadful judgments of God against him. They would even set the very day that God was to burn the world, like the self deceived modern Millerites. They would prophesy, that if any one did oppose them, God would send fire down from heaven and consume him like the blasphemous Shakers. They would proclaim that they could heal all manner of diseases, and raise the dead, just like the diabolical Mormons. They professed to have converse with spirits of the dead in heaven and hell, like the modern spirit rappers. Such a state of things I never saw before, and I hope in God I shall never see again.

The Edification of the Church Promoted by a Divinely Called Ministry of Diversified Talent. From the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.

Title of Periodical: The Methodist Quarterly Review and Magazine
Place of Publication:

Nature of Source: The periodical contains primarily transcriptions of sermons on a variety of theological and organizational topics, frequently including those sermons delivered at Methodist Quarterly or Annual Conferences. Largely theological, the periodical devotes considerable space to defending its beliefs and practices from attack.

Comment: This passage discusses the nature of priesthood to Methodists. Methodists believe the Levitical priesthood ended with the start of the Christian dispensation. Where Mormons believe in a literal successive priesthood, Methodists recognize abrogations in ordinations and believe in a priesthood made successive only by the presence of the Holy Spirit. Theirs is a metaphorical as opposed to literal succession. As with Mormon calls to priesthood offices, Methodists believe a call to the ministry involves both personal and ecclesiastical verification of a person's divine call to preach. Note that the passage refers to the "Mosaic priesthood" but distinguishes between the "unchangable priesthood of Christ in heaven" and "the Christian ministry on earth." Methodists believed in a universal Christian "priesthood of all believers." Ministers are ordained to ministerial but not to priesthood office. The "priesthood of all believers" gives Methodist ministers the authority to act in God's name; ordination simply confirms the church's sanction of a person and authorizes him to exercise offices for which he already possesses latent power.

Researcher: Marie Mackey
Excerpts (pages): "The Levitical priesthood was lineal. The existing priests consecrated their successors; not at the discretion of either party, but according to the primary appointment of God, that certain persons, members of a certain tribe, should be devoted to the divine service. A priesthood like that of the Mosaic does not now exist; but in its place we have the unsuccesive, unchangable priesthood of Christ in heaven, and the Christian ministry on earth. The institution of this ministry by our Lord, its important objects, its perpetual existence, together with the constant presence of Christ in its proper exercise by proper persons, are all included in those solemn word, 'Go ye therefore and teach all nation, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' From the ministers (to give them the more general name of the office) thus appointed by the Savior, their successors were to receive their external and official appointment. The originating call was to be with the Savior himself, acting by the Spirit, the Paraclete, sent, according to his promise, to supply his personal presence, and to remain with his church unto the end. To guard against false or mistaken pretensions, the existing ministry is bound to a strict examination of the candidates, conducted with unwavering reference to the question, 'Is there sufficient reason to believe that they are indeed moved by the Holy Ghost, and called according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ?' Thus far is the spirit of the prophets subject to the prophets" (325-326).

"...The proposition I have now to establish and improve is, that a ministry, thus divinely called, is necessary to the edification of the church, whether the term be applied to increase of numbers, or advancement in a genuine, rich, and practical holiness" (330).

Comment: Elias Smith offers a (logically) tangled argument against the current authority of bishops using Methodist bishops as an example of those who overstep their authority. Bishops in the New Testament were told says Smith what to preach and then to add nothing to their doctrinal script. Smith therefore indites Methodist bishops (and all other bishops) as guilty of overstepping the restrictions set by Christ on their priesthood office because they superintend church organization, a polity not specifically designated to them by Christ. Methodist bishops superintend church organization by one, assigning ministers to particular parishes, and two, holding ministers and members accountable for their right conduct to the bishops and to the Methodist Discipline, the laws for the church created by General Conference which is mostly composed of bishops. Smith argues only Christ as the supreme bishop possesses authority to judge moral conduct and therefore church courts represent a nefarious usurpation of divine power. Smith obviously years for a theocracy yet by inditing bishops on accounts of attempting to institute both organization and religious jurisdiction, Smith emerges as a kind of religious anarchist, suspicious of any form of ecclesiastical government. Smith probably opposes religious polity because of his emphasis on eschatology, a view held by many other nineteenth-century sects as well. However, the tremendous growth of membership in Protestant denominations, the Methodists in particular, and the delay of the expected Second Coming made some polity necessary for the survival of these denominations.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages):
"Christian: 'The universal Bishop, Jesus, has the whole command, and as such, has given directions to his ministers and the saints in the New Testament. This book contains all he requires of all his followers. The bishops are there directed what to preach, what to tell the world, and the saints; and are commanded not to add any thing to it, nor keep back any part of what is there enjoined.

Enquirer....Will you illustrate this by a similitude?

Christian....Yes. The government of the bishop of Rome, the bishop of England, or the government of the bishop of the Methodists, will serve as a similitude, for they are all antichristian governments, being exactly in opposition to that of the great Bishop Jesus Christ. As the government of the Methodist bishop is more known in this country than any of the others, I will use this as a similitude. In this government the bishop is over all the methodist ministers, and all the methodist people--he gives the ministers their orders, and the orders for the people to attend to--the people are accountable to the bishop, so are the ministers. The bishop is accountable to that authority which made him so--the ministers receive from the bishop a book of rules, called a discipline, for themselves and the people; if a minister, or any of the people, refuse to comply with what is required there, the bishop turns them out of the government.

In the New Testament, Jesus Christ is Bishop over all the saints, as the Methodist bishop is over all the Methodists. As the Methodist ministers are under the command of the bishop, to preach what he says, and where he says; so the ministers of Christ are bound to preach what he commands, when, and where he says, and the people are bound to hear and obey what Christ says by his ministers, who are bishops under him.

Enquirer....If this is the case, what need is there of these bishops over other ministers?

Christian....There is no need of them, they are the cause of divisions and contentions, among the saints, because, instead of being where Christ's ministers ought to be, they have, and are claiming that power, which belongs only to Christ; and these forms of government will finally come to nothing, when ministers and all believers are willing to be where and what Christ commands them to be" (pages 45-47).
Comment: This passage suggests Methodists view ordination, like other ordinances as baptism, as figurative rather than literal, mere religious form important insofar as it indicates an internal transformation but not a necessary step in and of itself. It is not salvific or otherwise obligatory nor is ordination accompanied by unique powers contingent upon faithfulness. The first portion of the passage indicates ordination represents the sanction of the church to a candidate's worthiness to join the ministry. The second passage says that English Methodism abolished ordination for almost thirty years because they considered it a meaningless papist ritual.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): "Ordination is the form or ceremony of setting apart persons properly chosen for the various offices of the ministry. The Methodist Churches, in common with Protestants, wholly reject the Romish idea of ordination being a sacrament. They regard it as simply a solemn and appropriate form of indicating the selection of the church, and its authorization of the persons selected to perform the various functions of the ministry. . . (681)

"(English Wesley) Ordination by the imposition of hands was mooted at the Conference of 1791 as being merely circumstantial. This was confirmed by a decision in 1794. At the Conference of 1822 the plan was again brought forward and withdrawn; but in 1836 the proposition, that all candidates for ordination should, if approved, be admitted into full connection by the laying on of hands, was passed with only two dissentients" (682).

Nature of Source: Methodists are primitivists meaning they seek to order their sect after the apostolic church of the New Testament. Wilson's work examines Methodist interpretations of New Testament beliefs and practices and their implementation in the Methodist Church.

Comment: This passage suggests the Methodist view that ordination does not transmit divine keys or "gifts of a miraculous nature." It does confer consecration, induction, and transfusion of office power. However, what this jargon largely comes to mean is that ordination signifies the church's approbation of a particular candidate. It sets a candidate apart for ministerial service but does not seal divine gifts upon him that will help him to serve.

Researcher: Marie Mackey

Excerpts (pages): "To a divine call united with the electing voice of a particular church, there was added ordination; before the man of God was constitutionally authorized to take the oversight of the flock of God. (1 Peter v. 1,2.) The blessed Redeemer himself, was ordained of the Father. (Acts xvii. 31.) As were the Twelve by Christ. (Mark iii.14.) But ordination by imposition of hands and prayer (Acts vi.6) appears to have been designed, as a standing ordinance or rite in the church; for thereby Elders were constituted in all the churches; (Acts xiv.23.) and thus to constitute them in every city, was Titus left at Crete. (i.5.)

By the "laying on of the hands of the Presbytery," certain gifts were imparted to Timothy. (1 Tim. iv. 12 - 2 Tim. i.6.) But gifts of a miraculous nature do not appear even in the Apostolic age, to have been generally conferred in that ceremony. Timothy was an evanglist; (2 Tim. iv.5.) and the gifts imparted to him, were "given by prophesy." But in the ordination of Elders to a particular church, mention is no where made of any such prophesy, or gifts having been attendant thereupon. Ordination, therefore, as a permanent institution, may be considered as having implied Consecration, Induction, and Transfusion of office power. Consecration, or a separating of the Candidate from the multitude, and a solemn and formal dedication of him to God, and to the functions of religion, is consonant with the true genius of the gospel. Christ himself, having been most singularly and most solemnly consecrated to his mediatorial labours. (Matt. iii.16,17.--Heb. vii.28.) And Saul and Barnabas were, by the express appointment of the Holy Ghost, separated to spread amongst the Gentiles the glad tidings of salvation. (Acts xii. 2, 3.) Induction, or installation, being evidently implied in ordination, we shall pass on to Transfusion of office power. Office power, is here restricted to that of ordination of the sacraments, and of the laying on of hands, in ordination &c. That these powers were imparted in ordination is evident, because in the Apostolic age and churches, no trace whatsoever appears of the laity, or of unordained persons having ever possessed them, whilst the reverse is undeniable. . ."

Researcher: Marie Mackey
Excerpts (pages): "A want of attention to the apostolic caution to lay hands suddenly on no man, has in all ages of the church, been a grand cause of declension and apostacy. No denomination are more particular in the observance of it than the methodist.--He must indeed make full proof of his ministry, who graduates even to the lowest degree of ordination among them.--No qualification short of an immediate call to the work of the ministry will bear any weight as a sufficient recommendation.--They believe that inspiration has not so far ceased but that all who engage in the arduous task of calling sinners to repentance, should themselves be men of clean hands and pure hearts, and moved by the Holy Ghost to the all important work. But how is all this to be known? a bare declaration on the part of the applicant is no sufficient evidence.--After procuring a recommendation from the society of which the candidate is a regular member; after passing an examination before a quarter or yearly conference, and after being received as a licenciate on trial for from two to four years; if then approved, if he is found blameless in all manner of conversation, holy in his walk and exemplary in his deportment; if he has gifts as well as grace for the work, and any have been truly awakened or converted by his preaching, then and not till then can he receive imposition of hands. "This I apprehend is a degree of strictness to be met with in but few branches of the christian church."

Nature of Source: Winchester, an influential preacher and leader in Universalist thought, poses his book as a response to critics of Universalism in the form of several dialogues between "a minister and his friend." The friend directs various questions to the minister, who responds with appropriate answers to key issues of Universalism such as the nature of eternal punishment, the love of God, and morality in Universalism.
Comment: Winchester is discussing the definition of the word everlasting and argues that is most often used, not in the sense of extensive time, but being eternal in nature. To support this argument, he mentions the "everlasting priesthood of Aaron" which no longer exists, being replaced by the priesthood of "Melchisedek" (47).
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "The apostle declares, that these everlasting ordinances were only till the time of Reformation, Heb.ix.10. And this everlasting priesthood of Aaron's son, had ceased long ago: [qts. Hebrews 7:12-18] "For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah: of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood. And it is yet far more evident: For that, after the similitude of Melchisedek, there ariseth another priest, who is made not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life: For he testifieth, Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedek...."
"The whole sum of the apostle's argument, in this epistle, tends to prove that the everlasting ordinance is now no more; and the everlasting priesthood of Aaron and his sons is now abolished.(47)

Comment: Pickering is addressing the issue of the eternal nature of God, and in doing so, explains that eternal does not refer specifically to great lengths of time, but, rather to God's limitless and vast influence. In supporting his interpretation, Pickering gives the examples of the Aaronic priesthood, Mosaic rituals, and the promise of inheritance to Israel of eternal scriptural aspects which no longer exist in his present time.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "Such are, for ever, everlasting, eternal--But do these terms necessarily signify an endless duration?...Every Jew, as well as every opposer of revelation would contends that the Priesthood of Aaron, the covenant of the circumcision, and all the rituals and laws of the Mosaic institution were still in force this hour; which would clearly imply that the instructions of the new Testament were nothing better than sheer imposition! It would open the most triumphant door to infidelity, by admitting that the oath of Jehovah was forfeited, in which he promised the hand of Canaan to the children of Israel for an everlasting possession. For it is well known that for centuries past they have had no inheritance in any part of the desirable land. In short, the truth of the doctrine of endless misery hangs suspended upon the definition of a single Greek word--Aionion: But it is a fact well understood, that this word signifies duration, without marking its precise limits; implying sometimes a shorter, and sometimes, a longer period, according to the subject with which it is joined.

Nature of Source: Several sermons given by leading Universalist pastor, Hosea Ballou, based on defining Universalist interpretations of scripture.

Comment: Ballou explains in depth the Universalist idea of the doctrine of the fall. Repudiating the idea of original sin, Ballou claims that the fall never occurred--that man's "vanity" was created by God in the beginning. This fits into the larger scheme of Universalist doctrine of universal salvation for all men in that while men may sin, it is due to the nature of their earthly existence and will eventually be restored to God as "heirs with Christ."

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "We shall now proceed to examine the common doctrine called the fall of man, and to show the want of both scripture and reason for its support...We read nothing in the scriptures of Adam's falling from the state in which he was created, no more than we read of Cain's falling from the state in which he was created...If Adam had not been constituted in an imperfect state how could he have sinned in that state?...If he sinned in the state in which he was first formed, then it is evident that he was possessed of no perfection or holiness that secured him against sin. What alteration was there effected in the constitution of Adam by what is called the fall?" (67-8).

"The common doctrine on the subject of this inquiry supposes that there was a real change produced in man's very nature by the first transgression; and such a change too, as to render the creature radically sinful and totally inclined to sin. But we read no such account where those things are particularly recorded. So far from any thing of this kind, we are not informed that either Adam or Eve ever committed a second crime...If man's very nature was so changed by Adam's sin a common opinion supposes, why have we no account of Adam's wicked life and of Eve's abominations?...The fact is we have no authority for this doctrine which is called fall" (68-9).

"...a sinful being can have no power to lead one who is perfect in holiness into transgression; all beings, therefore who are sinful must have been made subject to vanity, which is the state in which man stood when formed of the dust of the ground, and according to the Apostle's testimony in our text.

"...we shall consent, at once,...that the creature was made subject to vanity, not because of his own will, but by reason of the will of his Maker, who saw fit, in his infinite wisdom and goodness, to subject the creature to all the vanity of this mortal state in hope of a better and more perfect state hereafter"(70-1).

"But shall it be said, because God has made the creature subject to all this vanity, that he is therefore unfriendly to his offspring? No, my brethren, this is not the case...He did not forsake man in the beginning of his career in sin, but though he manifested his holy disapprobation of the defection of his children, he made them sensible likewise of his fatherly kindness and unchangeable goodness...That all gracious, merciful Creator, who made te creature subject to vanity, subjected him in hope"(76).

"But the universality of the hope of a future, happy existence, very fitly compares with the impartial goodness of God...one of the principal objects of the gospel of Jesus Christ seems to have been to present us with full and adequate proof of the doctrine of a future happy state for all mankind" (77).
he made himself so. Adam was mortal before he sinned, for the plain reason that immortal beings can neither sin nor suffer!"

"Our being made liable 'to the pains of hell forever,' by reason of Adam's sin is plainly contradicted by reason, revelation, and common sense. We are told that 'the son SHALL NOT bear the iniquity of the father--that 'his own iniquities shall take the wicked himself'-not some other person....All the punishment, or hell, of which the scriptures speak, we suffer in consequence of our own individual transgressions--not for those of a person who lived before the flood" (153-4).

Nature of Source: The autobiography of Reverend John Murray who brought the tenets of Universalism from England, where he was influenced by Relly, to the United States. He records his conversion to Universalist theology and his subsequent call to become a preacher and one of the founding leaders of the the Universalist faith.

Comment: Murray makes reference to his holy nature, even a setting apart for his work at very early age.

Excerpt (pages): "I was hardly two years old, when...according to the custom in our Church, I was carried to be received, that is, all who are privately baptized, must, if they live, be publicly received in the congregation. The priest took me in his arms, and having prayed, according to the form made use of such occasions, I articulated, with an audible voice, AMEN. The congregation were astonished, and I have frequently heard my parents say, this was the first word I ever uttered, and that a long time elapsed before I could distinctly articulate any other" (6).

"Devout persons pronounced that I was, by divine favour, destined to become a burning and shining light...ANd thought the Methodists insisted, that the doctrine of election, before repentance and faith, was a damnable doctrine; yet they admitted, that, after the manifestation of extraordinary evidences, the individual, so favoured, was unquestionably elected" (19).

Nature of Source: The autobiography of Reverend John Murray who brought the tenets of Universalism from England, where he was influenced by Relly, to the United States. He records his conversion to Universalist theology and his subsequent call to become a preacher and one of the founding leaders of the the Universalist faith.

Comment: Upon arrival in the United States, Murray encounters an old man who, on prompting f the Spirit, has built a worship house in the woods. Having turned down several preachers for his church, the man, Potter, believes that God "will send one, who shall deliver unto me his own truth; who shall speak of Jesus Christ, and his salvation" (126). Murray is resistant to the man's insistence that he is the chosen preacher, but eventually comes to realize this call as the Lord's will and initiates Universalist thought in America.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "And who, it was asked, will be your preacher? I answered, God will send me a preacher, and of a very different stamp from those, who have heretofore preached in my house. The preachers, we have had are perpetually contradicting themselves; but that God, who has put it into my heart to build this house, will send one, who shall deliver unto me his own truth" (126).

"My friends often ask me, 'Where is the preacher of whom you spake?' ....The moment I beheld you vessel on shore, it seemed as if a voice had audibly sounded in my ear: There, Potter, in that vessel, cast away on that shore, is the preacher, you have been so long expecting....the same voice seemed to repeat: Potter, this is the man, this is the person, whom I have sent to preach in your house!"(127).

Murray is astonished and inquires what "he could discern in my appearance, which could lead him to mistake me for a preacher?" "No, sir, it is not what I saw, or see, but what I feel, which produces in my mind a full conviction" (127).

Murray struggles for some time, wondering if this call to the ministry is from God, and finally decides that his circumstances are more than coincidental, but that "the good hand of God was in all these things. It is, I spontaneously exclaimed, it is the Lord's doings! and it is marvellous in my eyes. It appeared to me, that I could trace the hand of God, in bringing me, through a long chain of events, to such a place, to such a person, so evidently prepared for my reception...I will employ myself on the grounds of my friend, thus earning y own support, and health will be a concomitant; while I will preach the glad tidings of salvation, free as the light of heaven. The business, thus arranged, I became reconcile to the will of the Almighty..."(133-134).

Excerpt (pages): "You have brought my own experience to my mind: It pleased GOD...to bring me to seek earnestly for an unfading treasure; and by a train of circumstances, fixed the concern deeply upon my mind; and I laboured night and day, but could obtain no rest till one morning--a time never to be forgotten!--as I was walking on a journey, under a great distress, and when deliverance seemed farther from me than ever, all at once I was brought to resing my soul into the hands of God, and thus I expressed myself: 'Lord, here I am: A poor helpless sinner: I resign myself into thine hands; take me, and deal with me just as thou pleasest: I know thou canst do me no injustice.' Immediately these words came into my mind, with great power & sweetness: 'In an acceptable time have I heard thee; and in a day of salvation have I helped thee.' Isa.xlix.8. and I had then such a view of Christ, as to make me cry out "Glory to God in the highest! This is salvation; I know this is salvation!" Then those passages which you have mentioned, came into my mind with great energy; and I saw the fulness, sufficiency, and willingness of CHRIST to save me and all men, in such a manner as constrained me to venture my soul into his arms; and if I had ten thousand souls, I could have trusted them all in his hands. And O how did I long, that every soul of Adam's race might come to know the love of God in Christ Jesus! Excerpt (pages): "The office of Steward...is one of high responsibility...It is therefore an indispensable characterick in a steward, that he should be a man of strict honesty"(1).

"...guard against any abuse of the authority or influence which it might be in the power of the christian minister to exert over the temporal or moral insterests of those whom he was appointed to instrect; by declaring them to be 'STEWARDS of the mysteries of God."

"A steward is not a master, but a servant—not a Lord, but a minister and overseer of the affairs and interest of the household, and bound to consult the will of his Lord and Master in all things. To Christ, his divine Master, the minister is accountable at all time for the improvement or abuse of his office; 'and to this Master he must stand or fall.'

"In his commission, no domineering authority is imparted, nor permission to lord it over the heritage of God. No right is recognized to abuse his fellow-servants, disrregard their welfare, or exercise oppression.

"The minister and servant of Christ should not strive, but render himself and example of patience and forbearance to his flick, under all the trials and sufferings which are allotted to his experience in the path of duty"(6-7).

"By taking a lively interest in whatever affects their social, domestic and religious prosperity--...he endears himself to them, secures their friendship and confidence..." (7).

"But ministers are represented in our text as stewards of the mysteries of God.--From the use of the mysteries, which is here employed, thousands, without taking the trouble to examine what these mysteries are, ahve blindly received the inexplicable dogmas of modern creeds...they have been declared too high and too sacred for the grovelling reason of man to comprehend." (8)

"But it is by no means difficult to understand...They are called mysteries or secrets, only in reference to the dark ages which preceded their revelation."

"This is the burden of the testimony which the steward of the mysteries and many-fold grace of God is obligated to proclaim...And to render the gospel of eternal life which he proclaims, ...he mst be deeply imbued with its spirit" (13).

Comment: This report of the 1826 Universalist Convention of New York records decisions made by the convention to set guidelines for new societies as well as those who are "candidates for the ministry." His 1826 disappearance sparked a flood of anti-Masonic sentiment which spread across New England until about 1840. Morgan was never heard from again, and when a body was found floating in a nearby river, the Freemasons were blamed for his death.
Comment: Oaths were an important part of Masonic ritual. Here Morgan describes the oath of the Master Mason and the penalty for breaking it.

Title of Book:

Title of Article: "Eternity of God"

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Bowen & Cushing

Date of Publication: September 9, 1826

Library Location: BYU microfilm, #051B1701

Nature of Source: Published from 1819-1851 also under the title, Trumpet and Universalist Magazine, this periodical was the leading publication of the Universalist denomination. Edited by influential figure, Hosea Ballou, sometimes referred to as the "Father of Universalism," it was published weekly in order to inform members about various conventions and to spread Universalist doctrine.

Comment: This is an interesting treatise on the eternal nature of God. Greenwood reasons that for God to be a creator, he must be eternal, seeing as that finite beings cannot create themselves. He makes reference to God's existence before man, as well as into eternity. Greenwood believes that God's creation is not limited to this world, but extends to other worlds and other "created generations." While he does not claim that man shares God's same eternal nature, he concludes with a vaguely suggestive reference to man's sharing in God's "immortality."

Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): Greenwood begins by reasoning that all things must have had a Creator because they were not able to create themselves, and then continues, "And their Creator must have existed from all eternity, for the plain reason the first cause must necessarily be uncaused. As we cannot suppose a beginning without a cause of existence, that which is the cause of all existence must be self-existent, and could have had no beginning. And, as it had no beginning, so also, as it is beyond the reach of all influence and control, as it is independent and almighty, it will have no end.

Here then is a support which will never fail; here is a foundation which can never be moved--the everlasting Creator of countless worlds...He inhabits eternity...Ages on ages before even the dust of which we were formed was created, HE had existed in infinite majesty, and ages on ages will roll away after we have all returned to the dust whence we were taken, and still HE will exist in infinite majesty...commanding new created light to shine on new created worlds, and raising up new created generations to inhabit them."

"We can never be where he is not, nor where he sees and loves and upholds us not. He is our Father and our God forever. He takes us from earth that he may lead us to Heaven, that he may refine our nature from all its principles of corruption, share with us his own immortality, admit us to his everlasting habitation, and crown us with his eternity" (44).

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Chester, VT

Date of Publication: 1807

Library Location: BYU Microfiche, #080 Sh64a no. 12561

Nature of Source: Record of sermons given by Ferriss, a leading figure in establishing Universalist belief; published after his death in 1806.

Comment: Ferriss's sermon argues for the defining Universalist belief that God will save and protect all believers because of His inherent love for his children. Ferriss argues that God's creation of man was an act of selfless love and claims the love God has for his children surpasses the love a mother has for her children. Ferriss is not explicit on exactly what sense God is father to His children beyond that of creator, but uses reason to assume "the parental relation of the Creator to the creature, is the most important relation that comes within reach of our contemplation" (59). Ferriss argues that Satan's greatest deception is to make man, as he does with Eve, forget the parental love God has for him.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "...the parental relation of the Creator to the creature, is the most important relation that comes within reach of our contemplation; it is this relation in which we are the most interested, it being on account of this relation that we hope for future life and immortality" (59).

"God had no coadjutor in becoming the parent of children, he being the only first cause. Before the existence of his children, he could not be influenced by any motive, out of himself to give them existence. It was his own nature alone which moved him to become the parent of children. . . . (60)"

Ferris argues that "man may positively and absolutely know that God is his parent" through the "rational contemplation and comparison of our own ideas." "Man knows that he himself has an actual existence or being. He may know that he did not produce his own being, as he could not act previous to his existence. He may know, that nothing cannot produce a being, as nothing has no properties. He may know, therefore, that something must be eternal, as the original Parent or first cause of his being...In brief, therefore, he may know himself to be, as to his existence, the child of God" (61).

"But the relation of our heavenly Father to us is complete and undivided. . . We are the offspring of his own free eternal will" (65).

Place of Publication: Auburn, NY
Publisher: L.S. Everett and G. Tuttle
Date of Publication: 1827
Library Location: BYU Stacks, #BX9901.E829X Vol 5
Nature of Source: One of several periodicals which arose to support Universalist beliefs. While still strongly based on doctrinal principles, The Gospel Advocate is more locally centered on events in surrounding communities than larger periodicals such as The Universalist Magazine. It contains sermons on various theological issues, but also prints letters to the editor from its readership, includes a poetry section in every issue, and reports on secular events in the community, as well, such as obituaries, political proceedings, and "sentimental" anecdotes.
Comment: Field argues for the defining principle of Universalism, universal salvation for all men, by reasoning that heaven could not exist along side eternal punishment because the happiness of heaven would be marginalized for those who knew their families were suffering. For Field, the binding together of families does not occur through ordinances, but in the everlasting nature of God's love.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "Heaven is considered by all the various denominations of christians, as a place of compete and perfect happiness, where nothing ever enters to hurt or annoy the inhabitants of it. But how can it be a place of complete happiness, if the doctrines which are taught be true, viz. that a part, and even the greatest part, of mankind will be fixed in a place of endless torment: burning and roating in a lake of fire and liquid brimstone; and this too in the presence of those in heaven: husbands and wives; parents and children; brothers and sisters; the most near and dear connections, there to be separated; some to be rolling and tumbling on the waves and billows of this boisterous and burning lake--while those in heaven will be looking on, and beholding the sight unmoved and undisturbed!"
"Therefore, it must be, as I have said, an immortal principle, and they that love here will love eternally. And since some men will be in the possession of this godlike passion of love thro' the endless ages of eternity, it is impossible for them to be happy in heaven, while they behold any of their friends, or any of the human family suffering in torment, through the wasteless ages of eternity" (65).

published exposes of Masonic rituals, a consuming sweep of Anti-Masonry flooded New England until about 1840. Allyn, a former Mason, circuited the New England area with traveling shows which would act out and mock Masonic ritual. This almanac is just one piece of propaganda published and circulated by Allyn; it functions as a regular almanac, but also includes commentary on the evils of Masonry.

Comment: Allyn comments on the higher Masonic degree of the Royal Arch, a degree which adapts language of the Melchizedek priesthood in its honors.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "ROYAL ARCH--CALLED HOLY!!" Allyn describes the obligations of the initiate not to reveal the "ineffable key" of Arch Masonry and also the penalty for making such information public: "Penalty. To have the scull smote off, and the brains exposed to the scorching rays of the sun, &c." He describes the ritual in which the "pass word is, I AM THAT I AM, and is given through a burning bush by the master, who personates the great Jehovah on Mount Horeb!! The High Priest represents Aaron, and wears a mitre and ephod. ...The High Priest's Mitre has "Holiness to the Lord" painted on its front." He also gives illustrations of the "living arch," a formation members of the degree form as part of the ceremony.
Allyn warns against the outwardly religious nature of Masonry: "Masonry is a perfidious, revengeful and wicked order: but it professes to be religious, in order to hides its principles. It has crowns, High-priests, Princes, Sceptres, Knights, and regalia of monarchy, but it is loud in declarations of Democracy to conceal them... Comment: Allyn includes a story which he evidently thinks explains the origins of the Royal Arch Degree which includes the order of the "High Priesthood." Allyn posists the idea that it was created merely to entice the religious, and trap them in the darkness of Masonry.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages):
"The notorious Weishaupt, the German infidel and Philosopher, invented a number of the degrees of masonry all of which were based upon mystery, with oaths of secrecy, and mortal penalties. The reason that he made different degrees, was simply in consequence of the different dispositions of men when he intended to deceive: "that which to one was meat to another would be poison," and he being a man that understood human nature, preaped a degree to fit every man's conscience in society.

For the Clergy he prepared a degree with much care---and called in the "High Priest." After he had finished it, he selected clergyman to operate upon, and conferred it on him. The ceremony was very sublime; among other things the candidate was seated in a chair dressed in a costly robe and mitre, and the following scripture was then read to him by Weishaupt--heb VII C

The clergyman was then requested to take a horrible oath! and all this time the poor credulous dupe did not mistrust that Weishaupt's only object was to bring scripture into contempt, by ridiculous applications.
After the clergyman had retired, Weishaupt exclaimed to his companions, "Oh frail man, how easily art thou deceived! my plan has succeeded beyond my most sanguine expectations."

This degree of "High Priest" is yet in high repute among the masons in this country; the presiding officer in every chapter of royal arch masons is required to take it at this time" (24).

Comment: An anecdote adapted for the Gospel Advocate relates the Universalist position on the need for infant baptism. Universalists, who believed that God would eventually save everyone, felt a strong need for the baptism of the heart, an inward baptism unto God, but felt that infants, as well as the rest of mankind, could be saved without it.

Moreover, they were set forth by Christ, as patterns for our imitation, and well would it be for us all, if we imitated their humility and innocence more carefully. Yea, our blessed Saviour hath said, 'suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

Excerpt (pages): "It was in the month of October, 1802,...in the 24th year of my age, that I entered the study of Mr. Ballou. I had been with him not to exceed one month, when, one Sunday morning...Mr. Ballou was seized with a violent pain in the head, and came to me...saying, very mournfully, "Brother Stacy, you must reach to-day; for I am in such violent pain, I can not."
Stacy is astounded and says he cannot do it; "Moreover, if you had any idea of setting me to preach to-day, you should have informed me before we left home. I have some manuscripts which I could have taken for assistance; but I have now not a scroll of writing with me."
"I am glad," he said, "you have no writing with you; it would only be a trouble to you. You must learn to preach extemporaneously; and the better way is to begin in the first place."
"...this is the very place; and this is the time for you to begin...They know you are designing to preach, and they all want to hear you; and they will be ready to overlook your diffidence...And besides, you may say just what you please, and I'll get up and prove it all true, by Scripture" (115-116).
Stacy proceeds with the meeting, making a few mistakes, but is able to speak "probably twenty or twenty-five minutes" before Ballou closes the meeting. After the meeting, Stacy says, "I heard no more of Mr. Ballou's headache...I told him afterwards, and I always believed it, that his headache was feigned; though I could never make him own, or deny it." Nature of Source: The autobiography of Reverend John Murray who brought the tenets of Universalism from England, where he was influenced by Relly, to the United States. He records his conversion to Universalist theology and his subsequent call to become a preacher and one of the founding leaders of the the Universalist faith.
Comment: Murray's attitudes toward extensive gospel study were typical of Universalism.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "...my worthy friend was diligently gathering in the fruits of the earth. I was disposed to aid him, to the utmost of my abilities. He could not bear the thought of my labouring in the field. 'Why need you? have you not enough to engage your attention, in the business, on which you were sent?' Believe me my friend, my employment, in your field, will not interrupt my reflections. I can study better in the field, than in the chamber; it requires but little study to deliver simple, plain, gospel truth; to pervert this truth, requires a vast deal of worldly wisdom" (136).

Title of Book: The Plain Guide to Universalism
Title of Article:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: published by the author
Date of Publication: 1840
Library Location: BYU stacks, #BX9941.W45
Nature of Source: Thomas Whittemore was a leading figure in spreading Universalist ideas. An early historian of the faith, he was also editor of the Trumpet and Universalist Magazine, first started by Hosea Ballou. Whittemore's book defines the beliefs of Universalism while providing "Scriptural proofs of Universalism" and outlining the duties and organization of Universalist societies. Though it is written later in the Restoration period, it is a good summary of general Universalist beliefs and attitudes.
Comment: Whittemore is very clear in expressing the Universalist idea that the input of the lay members is just as, if not more important, than the preaching of formal ministers.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "Our laymen should see the necessity of exercising their spiritual gifts more frequently than they do. Meetings for religious improvement should be held, even in those places where no clergymen can be obtained. . .If a society has no interest of this kind, they need awakening from death to life. . .If there are but half a dozen or a dozen members of a society, who are willing to make the first attempt at holding meetings without a minister, let them start outward. Others will follow" (315).
". . .let those, who have honest hearts and good intentions speak. Will it be replied, that there is a difficulty here,--that very many good, honest believers in the truth, dare not attempt to speak in public on religious topics?"
"Men can talk about religion as well as about any other subject, if they feel it, and really believe it to be of paramount importance." Whittemore continues by saying that man "can vocally exult and be glad" on a number of different issues; "Why must he be dumb, then, on the best of all topics, religious truth?" (316).
"Weak and extravagant speakers have been so often heard in certain other denominations, that some conscientious believers in Universalism are at first startled at the idea of giving utterance in public to their religious thoughts. Every one should consult his own feelings on this subject. If can talk so as to be clearly understood on other subjects, it will do no harm for him to say something to his brethren on the subject of religion" (316).
"Too much is thought of mere minister meetings; as if no others could be tolerated. This is wrong. We have known societies o onward month after month, and year after year, holding their meetings without a stated pastor, exhorting one another. . . . They prospered,--they will continue to prosper,--for the Lord will not forsake such a society as this. It is a glory in Zion. . ." (317).
"Who can tell how many talented, worthy preachers of God's word, may be raised up in our denomination, from those who will date their first attempts at speaking in defense of the truth, back to the social, religious meeting held by a society destitute of a minister? . . Remember, that great effects often spring from remote and little causes. Despise not the "day of small things" (317).

Nature of Source: Webb's work is intended to be a handbook for Freemasons and others alike. It describes the nature of Masonry and each of the ascending degrees. It was intended as a reference source for Masonry, not an expose, and helped to standardize ritual of the order.

Comment: Webb comments on the Masonic idea of progression through instruction and also refers to the supposed ancient origins of Masonry.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "The propriety of our rites, while it demonstrates to the most sceptical and hesitating mind their excellancy and utility; it illustrates, at the same time, certain particulars, of which our ignorance might lead us into error, and which, as masons, we are indispensibly bound to know.

To make a daily progress in the art, is our constant duty, and expressly required by our general laws. What end can be more noble than the pursuit of virtue? What motive more alluring than the practice of justice? Or what instruction more beneficial than an accurate elucidation of symbolical mysteries which tend to embellish and adorn the mind? Every thing that strikes the eye more immediately engages the attention, and imprints on the memory serious and solemn truths: hence masons, universally adopting this method of inculcating the tenets of their order by typical figures and allegorical emblems, prevent their mysteries from descending into the familiar reach of inattentive and unprepared novices, from whom they might not receive due veneration.

Our records inform us, that the usages and customs of Masons have ever corresponded with those of the Egyptian philosophers, to which they bear a near affinity. Unwilling to expose their mysteries to vulgar eyes, they concealed their particular tenets and principles of polity under hieroglyphical figures; and expressed their notions of government by signs and symbols, which the communicated to their Magi alone, who were bound by oath not to reveal them. They Pythagorean system seems to have been established on a similar plan, and many orders of a more recent date. Masonry, however, is not only the most ancient, but the most moral institution that ever subsisted; every character, figure and emblem, depicted in a lodge, had a moral tendency, and inculcates the practice of virtue" (34).

Place of Publication: Philadelphia

Publisher: John Clarke

Date of Publication: 1831

Library Location: BYU Rare

Nature of Source: Accused in 1826 of murdering William Morgan, a Mason who published exposes of Masonic rituals, a consuming sweep of Anti-Masonry flooded New England until about 1840. Allyn, a former Mason, circuited the New England area with travelling shows which would act out and mock Masonic ritual.

Comment: Allyn comments on his disappointment in Masonic mysteries, which he feels are superficial and empty.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): Allyn first explains why he feels he should write a book on the masons. He says he became a mason because he heard it "announced from the pulpit as being the 'handmaid of religion--of divine origin--emanating from God himself"...I also saw that the most zealous of professors of religion would go, almost "barefoot and on frosty ground," five or ten miles to a Lodge-meeting, when, under the same embarassing circumstances, they would not go a fourth part of that distance to a prayer-meeting!"

"From premises like these I drew the inference, that Masons were either hypocrites in religion, or Masonry was religion in disguise. The latter opinion predominated, and I grew confident that in the secret ceremonies of the Lodge, some communications were made, from some source I knew not what, or how, on that all-important subject, eternity, that could not be obtained from the church, or any other society of men.

"Accordingly, as soon as I was "twenty-one" years of age, I entered the Lodge, was passed, and raised; but, alas! never was man more disappointed or chagrined than I was, when I first heard their "heavenly secrets, of divine origin." Listen, reader, and you shall hear:-- "The sun rises in the east!" "and sets in the west!" "and is in the south at high twelve!" "which is the regular time to eat and drink! (vi).

"The secrets and signs of antiquity were still less satisfactory. It appeared to me that they could not have been of divine origin...

I was prepared for, and expected to find in Masonry, something that would lead the mind seriously and rationally to contemplate nature, every degree opening a new field of admiration. This probably is the case with most of the Masons themselves, when they first join; and it is by habit only that they become attached to the Lodge-room....

"But the beauties of Masonry lie higher up the mystic ladder." This induced me to frequent the Lodges, with the determination, as I had commenced digging for hidden secrets, to continue the same course, as long as they could find masonic rubbish to dig in (viii).

Title of Book: History of the Hopedale Community

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Lowell, MA

Publisher: Thompson & Hill--The Vox Populi Press

Date of Publication: 1897
Nature of Source: Adin Ballou, Universalist leader and founder of the Hopedale Community, gives a history of the founding of the communal society in 1842 and how it functioned until its end in 1868. Ballou belonged to the Restorationist side of Universalism, which placed more focus on a period of punishment for sins before being ultimately saved. In its preface, the editor, William S. Heywood, notes that Hopedale was not a "device for bringing in the millennium by a skilfully contrived set of machinery," but rather a test to see "whether men believing in Christianity...could and should make those principle and precepts and that spirit dominant in all social and civil relations and concerns as well as in all individual acts and responsibilies" (vi).

Comment: Adin Ballou explains the reasoning behind the Hopedale Community and establishes a standard of belief for the society.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "I had come to see that the teachings of the Master were essential to human well-being in this world as well as in the world to come; that it was one of the declared objects of Christ's labors to inaugurate the kingdom of heaven on the earth; and that it was the imperative duty of his disciples to pray and to work earnestly for that sublime end, as one of the best preliminaries to immortal blessedness." (2)
"I was of the progressive wing and longed most ardently to see New Testament Christianity actualize--made practically the controlling agency in all the relations and concerns of life." (3)
Ballou and others draw up a "Standard of Practical Christianity" from which the Hopedale Community later emerges:
"Our immediate concern is the promotion of useful knowledge, moral improvement, and Christian perfection. We recognize no spiritual father but God; no master but Christ. We belong to that kingdom of 'righteousness, peace, and joy,' which is not of this world,' whose throne is holiness, whos sceptre is truth, whose greatness is humility, whose pre-eminence is service, whose patriotism is love of enemies, whose heroism is forbearance, whose glory is self-sacrifice, whose wealth is charity, whose triumphs are salvation."
The standard continues by renouncing the "governments of this world," expressing a belief in "universal charity" "even to the beasts of the earth," an abhorrence of war, sin, and slavery, and avoiding "excess in eating, drinking, sleeping, recreation, labor, study, joy or sorrow."
The standard closes with the purpose of the community: "Finally as disciple of Jesus Christ, before whose judgement sear all must appear, we acknowledge ourselves bound by the most sublime, solmen, and indispensable obligations, to 'be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect' in all possible respects; and whereinsoever we come short thereof, to take shame to ourselves, seek divine pardon, repair to the utmost our delinquincies..." Comment: Adin searches for some type of structure to actualize his theories on the need for higher living through Christianity. He wants their new society to still be part of the world, and yet separate in that they strive to live a higher form of Christianity which influences their everyday life.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "We were a 'peculiar people' in the professing Christian world. We had taken a stand unlike that of any of our contemporaries in either church or state--in any existing form of social life...(9) As popular as Christianity was, in church and state and general society, there was for such ideas, convictions, principles as ours, no place of shelter, nurture, and practical actualization--no congenial and permanent home. They were too radical, too uncomfortable to the established institutions, customs, practices, and fashions of this world..." (10).

"Nor could we stand in our separate and unrelated individuality--apart from the world and all existing associations, institutions, organizations, and apart from each other. Not at all. We must...combine our forces, institute a church,a system of society, that should truly represent our convictions; build a new civilization radically higher than the old, which should be in deed and in truth the realization of a divine order of human life founded on the great ideas of the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man." (12-3)

I conceive, sir, I have business here; I am one of your parish, I was warned to attend for the purpose of receiving instruction; and to whom should I apply, but my minister?...I remember, sir, when we were last here, you told us, there was no such thing as a feeling operation of the spirit of God; I request to therefore to know, how we are to understand that article of our Church, which pronounces the doctrine of election full of special comfort to all godly person, as such as feel in themselves the working of the spirit of the Lord? "You have nothing to do with the articles, you do not understand them.' I should suppose, sir, that every member of a Church had something to do with the articles of his Church; and if I do not understand them, suffer me to come to you for information" (23-24).

'Well, I do still say, there is special operation of the spirit: I have never experienced any thing of this description.' How then, suffer me to ask, could you say, when you were ordained, that you felt yourself moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon you the office a teacher?" (24).

"I conceive, my lord, that the engagement entered into at my baptism, cannot be fulfilled without the aid, and operation of the spirit of the Lord; and I am taught to consider this ordinance [confirmation] as a mean of grace, through which I may obtain the aid of the Holy Spirit, so requisite to my well doing" (25).

Comment: This is a prime example of the anti-hierarchical attitudes prevalent in Universalism. The author sarcastically praises the orthodox clergy for their "noble" lineage, which he dates back to Satan in the Garden of Eden. He blames the clergy for a number of world catastrophes, and obviously feels that priesthood has done little good for religion.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): In this country we make little of ancestry. But when a man or a class of men, adhere, without the least deviation, to the spirit and conduct of a long line of illustrious ancestors, who plead the appointment of the Almighty, the patent of their nobility, it must be admitted the descendant is entitled to all the honours of the father; and when one adopts from choice and obeys with the most unshaken resolution the lessons of paternal instruction, it is certain he has a right to the glory of his ancestors and to be considered as inheriting all their virtues. You can boast ancestry that might make the proudest pretenders to antiquity blush for the recentness of their origin, and the dilapidated noble, who can trace his family back to the resting of the Ark upon Ararat, seem an upstart of the last generation!

Your reverences will recollect the first of your race, recorded in history, was coeval with the first of the human family; that he was justly renowned as being more subtle than any other beast the Lord God had created; and, what must exalt you in the estimation of the discerning, your claim to the same characteristics, has been maintained with the utmost scrupulosity and success from that time to this. The father of the priesthood commenced his labours, when coiled around the tree of knowledge, by a sermon upon good and evil, upon knowledge and death; and true to his example, the burden of the discourses pronounced, by our in ever since, has been the same, and with this singular good fortune, that the people have never been able to discern good from evil nor to acquire knowledge sufficient to preserve them from the premature death your extraordinary care had procured for many.

This renowned ancestor, whose spirit, like the mantle of Elijah, with a double portion, has fallen upon his descendants, enforced his lessons with the promise that his auditors should become gods; and, though in more modern times the promise is varied in words, the spirit remains entire. Your reverences promise your disciples that they shall becomes sons of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ who you teach us to call the eternal Jehovah.

Your ancestors were highly esteemed. They had the credit of being counsellors to kings and emperours. They were the directors of all important affairs. Their hate could create a war and involve nations in ruin. Their fear, or malice, or treachery, could stay the arm of battle and leave one army to be consigned to the feebleness of death by the other. They examined private life. The most secret of the domestick apartment were open to their inspection. The most sacred and the most endearing engagements and connections could not be observed until they had said their prayer or pronounced their benediction. Their care commenced ere the child was born and ceased not till after its death. All in publick and private life was subject to their direction; and they recieved a tenth of the products of the earth, the firstlings of the flocks and the most choice part of every offering, besides donations, charitable contributions, and numerous exactions, as their portion secured to them by the will of their Lawgiver. You need not blush to hear enumerate the splendour, the wealth and the power of your ancestors; for, as you inherit their virtues, you are entitled to their honours.

The cry of degeneracy, which is often raised against a once eminent family, cannot be raised against the Priesthood. With a zeal that baffles credulity and a steadiness of purpose that almost argues the intervention of a miracle, the whole family have adhered to the principles of their founder and even improved upon his cunning, and far surpassed him in the art of deception, and in making mankind miserable.

To your race, gentlemen, it is, that we can attribute most of the wars which have depopulated the world. Your lessons have overwhelmed empires and your pious instructions have had the facility to reduce mighty nations to a single page of the historian or to a stanza in the song of the bard. We give you credit for the intestine divisions with which the people are often torn, and to your salutary preaching may be ascribed most of those secret vices which are fostered in our bosoms...(105-106).

Comment: This excerpt from Ballou's Notes on the Parables is based on Matthew 5:13, and Ballou's interpretation of the scripture identifies the ministry as the salt which has lost its savor.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): Ballou begins by explaining that it is the sanctification of the Holy Ghost which gives the ministry its savor, and the "Holy Ghost is therefore, the salt of the everlasting covenant ordered and in all things sure" (17).
"A departure from the simplicity of the gospel of God, disallowing the power of the salt of the covenant to sanctify and season the sacrifice, setting up creeds, modes and forms as necessary unto salvation, leading proselytes to depend on a righteousness of their own for acceptance with God, is undoubtedly meant by the ministers of the word losing their savor, and becoming good for nothing. Such has been the melancholy falling away for the christian ministry, and such, for a long time, has been the inprofitableness of their labors." (17).

"With unreasonable, unscriptural, and cruel doctrines and ecclesiastical disciplines, have the sheep of Christ been driven from the fold, and scattered on barren mountains" (17).

"Societies are now formed, at the expense of which sea and land is compassed to proselyte men to those sentiments and customs which have kept the christian church in a perpetual strife and debate, persecution and blood, ever since they were invented.

"The Lord will surely deliver his people from such shepherds, and make them who have dishonored him, to be lightly esteemed" (18).

Comment: Webb comments on the Masonic lamb-skin apron, the most important piece of clothing in Masonic ritual.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "Every candidate, at his initiation, is presented with a lamb-skin, or white leather apron. The lamb has in all ages been deemed an emblem of innocence; he, therefore, who wears the lamb-skin as a badge of masonry, is thereby continually reminded of that purity of life and conduct which is essentially necessary to his gaining admission into the Celestial Lodge above, where the Supreme Architect of the universe presides (35).

Title of Book: Allyn's Ritual of Freemasonry
Comment: Allyn comments of the degree of the "Heroine of Jericho," one of the first degrees designed for women in Freemasonry.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages):

Heroine of Jericho

"This degree is conferred upon royal arch Masons, their wives and widows; hence it is sometimes called the ladies' degree.

It is generally conferred at parties composed exclusively of royal arch Masons, their wives and widows, convened for that purpose at the house of some royal arch Mason." The female initiate is reminded that "the degree of heroine of Jericho is not at all like Masonry in any of its bearings," and she swears an oath to be loyal to the Masons. This degree is based on the story of Rahab, the harlot of Jericho, and the women initiates promise to follow her example in protecting or hiding Masons in need.

Allyn claims this degree was made up in order to consolidate female support during the time of Antimasonic fervor. He says, "Yet I never have seen a person who received it prior to the abduction of William Morgan. And it is generally believed by those heroines of my acquaintance, that it was 'got up' by those concerned in that masonic outrage. And by swearing their female relatives to conceal the same crimes, should they come to their knowledge, which they themselves, as royal arch Masons, felt bound to perpetrate, against the law of the land, upon the traitor Morgan. They expected and hoped to receive the same hospitality from them, in case they were suspected, as did the spies in the house of the harlot Rahab. (175)

"The secrets and ceremonies of this degree have become extensively known in the state of New York, and in most of the states of New-England, among royal arch masons, their wives and widows. It was introduced into Connecticut in 1827..." (177).

Nature of Source: This is the first volume of a series of monthly magazines published to be "a medium of reciprocal communication between the wide spread branches of the great Masonic family" (4). It includes various treatise on the origins and nature of the Masonic order, detailed accounts of lodge meetings from across the country and the world, as well as relevant stories and obituaries.
Comment: Inglesay, former Master of Solomon's Lodge, no. 1, offers a fairly characteristic response to the question of the need for secrecy about Masonic rituals. Inglesay, like many apologists, claim that such rituals need to be kept secret because of their sacred nature; one who is not a Mason will not understand and appreciate their significance.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "It is asked, and with some emphasis, if Masonry is as valuable, and is really possessed of so much treasure, why keep it a secret,--why clothe all your proceedings in mystery, and cover yourselves as in a mantle of darkness,--why not communicate all freely, and to all indiscriminately? Our answer is, 'We did not so receive it, nor can we so impart it.' More than this, from the fact that our traditions, our sacred traditions, are confined to 'true and worthy Borhthers,' to such only as have entered the Lodge in due form; who have been duly and truly prepared, worthy and well qualified...The value and importance of this secrecy is fully proved by the antiquity of our Order. While every other human institution is constantly liable to fluctuation and decay, ours, the oldest known to man, still blooms and blossoms as a green bay tree. He is little acquainted with human character who does not know that much value is placed upon what is difficult to be procured, and little upon that of easy acquisition" (365).

THE MASONIC MYSTERY

A Deacon of a certain Baptist Church being closely pressed by a lady to disclose the secrets of Masonry, thus replied. A man learning a ship have arrived in port, went on board to satisfy his curiousity. After he had viewed many wonderful things, the captain exhibited a trunk glittering with gold and jewels. "What is in this?" inquired the anxious beholder. "Give me five dollars," said the captain, "and I will show you." Out went the man's money and then open went the captain's trunk, when, lo! there was another trunk inside stillmore curious than the first. 'What is in that?' asked the inquirer. 'Give me five dollars more and you shall see.' The cash was paid; and, lo, another smaller trunk was found in that; and so the visiter continued to pay five dollars, and find trunk within trunk, until at last all his money was gone, when the last and smallest trunk was opened, which, wonderful to tell, contained NOTHING!! It impresses on our minds a belief of the being and existence of a Supreme Deity, without beginning of days or end of years; and reminds us of the reverence due to his holy name. It includes various treatise on the origins and nature of the Masonic order, detailed accounts of lodge meetings from across the country and the world, as well as relevant stories and obituaries.
Comment: Inglesay gives a explanation for why women were not allowed in Masonic orders--because her gentle nature is too refined to need the rituals of Masonry to guide her life. This passage is not only interesting for its position on women in the order, but for what it claims the purpose of Masonic order to be for males, as well--to keep his rough nature in check.
Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): "But how happens it, asks a fair inquirer, that God's last, and best gift to man, is not permitted to enter the precincts of the Lodge? We answer, because she is a gift to man--she is not man. She is not rough, rugged, selfish man. She is kind, gentle, lovely woman. Masonry is instituted for man, because he is strong in frame, and strong in nature, and calling for all the checks and restraints, that may be imposed, to keep that nature in subjection; because man pursuing the line of his vocation, necessarily engaging in all the strife and collision and turmoil of life, is apt to forget others, in his devotion to self. Woman's whole duty in life, with the world, in combination with her essential character, would seem to render it an act of superrogation for her to assume the obligations of Masonry. Her province, too, is to lean upon "strong robust man;" and his duty is to avail himself of every proper means, the better to sustain and support her." (365)

Comment: The question of whether females should preach the gospel was greatly contested in the Universlist faith. Noted as having the largest population of female preachers of the Protestant religion, Universalists of both sex were outspoken on the issue. Printed as a continuation of a previous article written on the "revolting" nature of female preachers, this article prints a response from a reader, Phebe, and then continues with a harsh response to her objections. As a religion with little emphasis on order or priesthood, objections to female preaching centered more on 19th century views of the nature of women, rather than theological objections to female ministry.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): Phebe's letter:

"Your objections...respecting women's preaching, I consider illiberal and erroneous; assuming to yourselves a kind of dictatorial power incompatible with the freedom of discussion which you frequently invite. That women have a right to teach, preach, or exhort, and that they are as capable of doing either, according as the Almighty shall call and qualify, is clear and evident, both from reason, scripture and common sense...The females generally have no disposition to exchange dresses with you until they are rendered more reputable by a class of men who assume the exclusive right of pointing out the way to heaven."

"I have seen many female preachers in my time, and never recollect of seeing one in that capacity insulted or abused; but their preaching was attended with as much effect, as well received, and the congregation as much edified, and comforted as ever I did by the preaching of a man."

"If preaching the gospel, is over-stepping the bounds of decency and decorum, I think it ought to be discouraged both in men and women...But is there any subject more sublime? Any better calculated to call into action, the tender sympathies of the female bosom? Does she not feel an equal interest in the reformation of the human family? And do we not receive from women the most useful part of our instruction? Are we not indebted to them for our very existence? And why in the name of common sense shall they be degraded below their proper rank in society?"

"That it is not so convenient for them, I will admit; but I must contend, they have the same right as a man and are capable of doing as much good."

PHEBE (180-1)

Author "T. F." bitterly mocks her letter, saying that he, too, has seen many women preachers, and "we have always pitied and despised them! What do you think of that, Phebe? A woman who can break over all bounds of decency...is no longer an object of adoration but of disgust and abhorrence. No---a woman should like the sensitive plant, shrk from such boldness and indiscretion; she should never aspire to be an oak...."(181).

"It is to the softer sex we look as to a beacon blaze to guide us amid the whirlwind and the storm of human ills....How important then that woman, altogether lovely as she is---should take heed to her ways; for is she once falls it is forever---she falls never more to rise" (182).
"We have but one more word to say---if Phebe or any other dear modest creature is called and qualified," and is about to shine---they shall have our coat, hat, and---no more will wear the small clothes ourself!

Nature of Source: Record of sermons given by Ferriss, a leading figure in establishing Universalist belief; published after his death in 1806.

Comment: Ferriss's sermon relies on a comparison between the promises made to Biblical Zion and the love He has for those of the Universalist faith. He reasons that because of God's love for all his children and because of the Universalists' love for God, they can assume the same blessings and protection promised to Zion.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock
Excerpt (pages): Quoting God's promise to Zion in Isaiah, "Yet I will not forget thee," Ferriss claims that there is consolation for the "individual, or community, who can realize to itself an application of this gracious declaration"(58). "If we...can realize this declaration which was made to Zion, as true to us, we may profit by it in an eminent degree...Is there an individual in this audience who may not safely apply the promise of my text to himself? I presume there is not one. Remember, O doubter, whoever thou art, that thou canst not be in a worse situation than Zion appeared to be in, when she said, the Lord hath forsaken me. If the declaration was then true to Zion, why may it not be now true to those who doubt no more than Zion did? ...If the promise had been grounded on any particular merit of Zion, which you have no claim to, or on any particular character of Zion not applicable to you, then you might reasonably doubt of the promise being applicable to you. But this is not the case" (58).

Comment: This is a metaphorical treatise on the idea of Zion. Author, "T.G." argues that if Zion was so dear to the Jews, then the equivalent, the gospel system, should be equally as valuable to the Christian churches of his day.

Researcher: Miriam Murdock

Excerpt (pages): "Nothing on earth has been so dear to good men as Zion...Zion originally signified that part of Jerusalem which was taken from the Jebusites, and was styled the city of David or Zion.--In the reign of Solomon, who succeeded David, the Temple was built in this place; so that this Temple with all its legal rites, and all the spiritual good things, which it prefigured, were comprehended under the general name of Zion" (42).

"Nothing was so dear to the Jews, as the worship of God in his Temple...But that which rendered Zion so dear to pious men, was the presence of God, and his ordinances, the Temple and the Ark of his Covenant."

"The article Zion is applicable likewise to the Christian Churches. This is called Mount Zion the city of the living God...The Jewish Church may be termed the legal, but the Christian Church the gospel dispensation. The former may be called the type or shadow; the latter the anti-type or substance; consequently, the glory of the christian dispensation must excel that of the law, as much as the substance does the shadow. Hence, if Zion as comprehending the Jewish church and Temple worship, was dear to pious men, much more dear is the Gospel system to men of the same character" (43).

Continues by saying that "the adversity and trouble of Zion causes such men to weep;" for "when Jerusalem and the first Temple were in ruins, the pious captives in Babylon wept." He compares this state of Zion to the present state of Christian churches. "The Protestants have reformed in many things, but yet retain many popish errors" (45).

"If the Jews in their captivity wept when they remembered Jerusalem in her ruins, how much more reason have we to weep when we see our spiritual Jerusalem, our Mount Zion and city of the living God laid in ruins by doctrines so pernicious?" (44).
Although he does not believe that the Fall of Adam was necessary, Bellamy implies that it occurred for a good purpose.

"He [God] did not decree that Adam should fall, any more than he did that the seed of Abraham should turn out such a stiff-necked rebellious race. He decreed to permit both to do as they did; but this neither lessens his goodness, nor their sin: for God is not obliged to put his creatures under such circumstances as they shall never be tempted nor tried; and when they are tried, he is not obliged to keep them from falling; it is enough that they have sufficient power to stand, if they will;--which was the case with Adam. Besides, God had wise ends in permitting Adam to fall; for he designed to take occasion therefrom, to display all his glorious perfections in the most illustrious manner: So that we may say of it (and should, if we loved God above ourselves) as Joseph does of his brethren's selling him--Ye meant it for evil, but the Lord meant it for good: So here, Satan meant it for evil, but God meant it for good; even to bring much glory to his great name: therefore be still, and adore his holy sovereignty . . . Topics: Agency, Divine mission of the United States

Author: Sharman, Edward

Title of Book: The Christian World Unmasked: or an Enquiry into the Foundation of Methodist Camp-Meetings; with a plan for their correction and improvement as recommended by Mr. John Wesley; and a Looking-Glass, for Talkative Professors of Religion.
Written by a self-described "friend to Methodists," this pamphlet uses John Wesley's writings to critique Methodism in nineteenth-century America (particularly the chaotic nature of Methodist camp-meetings, the hypocrisy of Methodist ministers, and the legitimacy of Methodist beliefs—particularly about the trinity). This work includes parallels with various aspects of the restoration, including the articles of faith and the importance of American democracy. Although this work was published in the United States and includes sympathetic references to the American revolution, it seems likely that the author lived the first portion of his life in England. Referring to himself as "a Northamptonshire Farmer," Sharman had previously published three tracts near London, including A Letter on the doctrine of the trinity (London, 1795), A caution against trinitarianism (Market-Harborough, 1799), and A second caution against trinitarianism (Market-Harborough, 1800). The Worldcat and Eureka databases do not indicate the author's birth or death and there is no reference to him in either the American Biographical Archive, the Dictionary of National Biography, or the British Biographical Archive (though the latter indicates that there was a prominent family of Sharmans living in Northampton during this period of time).

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):

Although very critical of the religious beliefs and practices of others (particularly the Methodists), Sharman begins with a disclaimer that reads like the eleventh article of faith. "Nor do I desire to deprive any one of worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; that is the birth-right of man conferred [sic] on him by his sovereign maker, and the invaluable and most glorious privilege of the free sons of Columbia" (5). Sharman senses a conflict between democracy and contemporary ministers. "Thanks, ten thousand thanks are due to the enlightened free sons of Columbia, that at their most glorious revolution, they had the good sense to divorce the church from the state, and thereby gave the death wound to spiritual despotism, and placed the religion of Christ to stand or fall by its own native excellency as he left it. But to the disgrace of too many of our clergy, they act as though they considered freedom a curse, and wished the resurrection of despotism, instead of burying the monster and preaching its funeral from that text, 'I will make they grave, for thou art vile' (64-65).

The History of the Destruction of the City and Temple of Jerusalem

This work narrates Jewish history from forty years after the crucifixion to the nineteenth century. Worldcat indicates that the author, Thomas Brown, was born in 1766 but does not list a death date. I could not find any other biographical information on Brown. (He is not listed in the American Biographical Archive.) An advertisement at the end of the work indicates that Brown had previously published an Account of the People Called Shakers which was well-received by at least two nineteenth-century scholars: Timothy Dwight and Benjamin Silliman. (The advertisement includes extracts from Dwight's Travels and Silliman's Tour from Hartford to Quebec, describing this history in laudatory terms.) It is evident from the advertisement that the author had once been a Shaker but had subsequently become disaffected.

Comment: The work has a number of pertinent references to LDS doctrine regarding Israel, sectarian strife, apostasy, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):

At the beginning of an appendix on Christian persecution, the author discusses the apostasy that occurred at the beginning of the Christian Era.

"But as the apostacy of the Jews was foretold, and that for their sins they should be dispersed; so it was clearly predicted by several of the apostles, that there should be a falling away of the church, that there should be a departure from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrine of devils, &c. 'And as the apostacy overspread the church of Israel, for many ages, says Bishop Newton, so it hath overspread the church of Christ: the apostacy therefore is the same in both churches.' But till the apostacy took place, which gradually increased, the church was persecuted by the Pagans, but when it became established by the civil power, or by Constantine the Roman emperor, and became united to a kingdom of this world, it ceased being a kingdom of Christ: and thus, when the church became established by the civil power, the professed christians then became persecutors, and paid the Pagans back again in their own coin, and also persecuted the Jews, and all those who departed from the established church, or professed religion one side of it. And when persecution begins, religion ends. Christ never used any thing that looked like force or violence, except once, and that was to drive bad men out of the temple, and not to drive them in" (241).

Bellamy discusses the apostasy of the primitive church, concluding that the Reformation was a type of Restoration.

"And God carried on his work through a sea of blood, and in about three hundred years conquered the Roman empire.

"No sooner is this done, but the mystery of iniquity begins to work, and the man of sin to be revealed. The devil and his servants turn their coat, and, under the cloak of religion and good order, establish the kingdom of Satan in a new form: for it is the nature of mankind to hate true religion. And now Antichrist reigns, and scatters the holy people, and wears out the saints of the most high, for a time, and times, and half a time. In the mean while, the woman flies into the wilderness, the witnesses prophecy in sackcloth, until, at last, the witnesses themselves are slain: And now religion is driven even just out of the world, and there had been no hope, but that God awoke as one out of sleep, like a might man that shouteth by reason of wine. And behold the spirit of life from God enters into the two witnesses, that is, Luther and Calvin, and others their contemporaries; and they stood upon their feet, and great fear fell upon them which saw them: And God put them out of their enemies reach: And there was a great earthquake, and a tenth part of the city fell . . . Rev. ix: And a glorious day began to dawn" (382-383).
Barclay was born in Scotland in 1648 and educated in France. He joined the Society of Friends (Quakers) in 1666 after returning to Scotland from his educational experiences on the continent. He published the Theses Theologicae (1675) as part of a public debate in Aberdeen and soon thereafter published his Apology (1678). Written originally in Latin and English, the Apology was translated into a number of languages (High and Low Dutch, French and Spanish) and became a standard statement on Quaker beliefs. Placing its emphasis on the "inner light" of the believer, the Apology argues against traditional Christianity (Catholicism and Protestantism), asserting that neither the church nor the scriptures could claim completeness. Ultimate authority, according to Barclay, resided in the personal workings of the Holy Spirit.

Comment: This work contains pertinent material on baptism, dispensations, apostasy, restoration, and the freedom to worship according to one's own conscience. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
Barclay's remarks on the relationship between Quakers and the rest of Christianity bears a striking resemblance to LDS self-conceptions.

"[T]hey [those Christians who are not Quakers] maliciously say, that we deny any heaven or hell but that which is within us, and that we deny any general judgment; which slanders the Lord knows are foully cast upon us, whom God hath raised for this end, and gathered us, that by us he might confound the wisdom of the wise, and bring to naught the understanding of the prudent; and might, in and by his own Spirit and power in a despised people (that no flesh might glory in his presence) pull down that dead, dark, corrupt image, and mere shadow and shell of Christianity, wherewith Antichrist hath deceived the nations: for which end he hath called us to be the first-fruits of those that serve him, and worship him no more in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the Spirit. And though we be few in number, in respect of others, and weak as to outward strength, which we also altogether reject, and foolish if compared with the wise ones of this world; yet as God hath prospered us, notwithstanding much opposition, so will he yet do, that neither the art, wisdom, nor violence of men or devils shall be able to quench that little spark that hath appeared; but it shall grow to the consuming of whatsoever shall stand up to oppose it. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it! yea, he hath arisen in a small remnant shall arise and go on by the same arm of power in his spiritual manifestation, until he hath conquered all his enemies, until all the kingdoms of the earth become the kingdom of Christ Jesus.

"Until Him that hath begun this work, not among the rich or great ones but among the poor and small, and hath revealed it not to the wise and learned, but unto the poor, unto babes and sucklings; even to him, the Only-wise and Omnipotent GOD, be honour, glory,

Publisher: Harper and Brothers
Date of Publication: 1843
Library Location: F1230 P9692 1843b vols. 1-3 (stacks)
Nature of Source: Published in 1843, Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico is one of the great historical narrative of the nineteenth century. Drawing extensively upon early Spanish accounts, Prescott documents the rise and fall of Aztec civilization.
Comment: Prescott's description of ancient Mexico includes allusions to a number of relevant subjects regarding ancient civilizations, sectarian strife, the modern recapitulation of biblical events, pre-Columbian migrations to the Americas, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages): Prescott is sympathetic to the conquistadors inasmuch as they lived in a culture of corruption that was dominated by the Catholic Church. "This passage of history [a brutal massacre enacted by the conquistadors on the natives of Cholula] is one of those that have left a dark stain on the memory of the Conquerors. Nor can we contemplate at this day, without a shudder, the condition of this fair and flourishing capital thus invaded in its privacy, and delivered over to the excesses of a rude and ruthless soldiery. But, to judge the action fairly, we must transport ourselves to the age when it happened. The difficulty that meets us in the outset is, to find a justification of the right of conquest, at all. But it should be remembered, that religious infidelity, at this period, and till a much later, was regarded--no matter whether founded on ignorance or education, whether hereditary or acquired, heretical or Pagan--as a sin to be punished with fire and faggot in this world, and eternal suffering in the next. This doctrine, monstrous as it is, was the creed of the Romish, in other words, of the Christian Church,--the basis of the Inquisition, and of those other species of religious persecutions, which have stained the annals, at some time or other of nearly every nation in Christendom. Under this code, the territory of the heathen, wherever found, was regarded as a sort of religious waif, which, in default of a legal proprietor, was claimed and taken possession of by the Holy See, and as such was freely given away by the head of the Church, to any temporal potentate whom he pleased, that would assume the burden of conquest" (vol. 2, 29-31).
In a subsequent footnote, Prescott contrasts Catholic and Protestant approaches to conquest.
"The ground on which Protestant nations assert a natural right to the fruits of their discoveries in the New World is very different. They consider that the earth was intended for cultivation; and that Providence never designed that hordes of wandering savages should hold a territory far more than necessary for their own maintenance, to the exclusion of civilized man. Yet it may be thought, as far as improvement of the soil is concerned, that this argument would afford us but an indifferent tenure for much of our own unoccupied and uncultivated territory, far exceeding what is demanded for our present or prospective support. As to a right founded on difference of civilization, this is obviously a still more uncertain criterion. It is to the credit of our Puritan ancestors, that they did not avail themselves of any such interpretation of the law of nature, and still less rely on the powers conceded by King James' patent, asserting rights as absolute, nearly, as those claimed by the Roman See. On the contrary, they established their title to the soil by fair purchase of the Aborigines; thus forming an honorable contrast to the policy pursued by too many of the settlers on the American continent" (vol. 2, 32).

Place of Publication: Watertown, [New York]

Publisher: Printed for the author

Date of Publication: 1819

Library Location: HBLL 080 Sh64a no. 49404 (microfiche)

Nature of Source: Written by a self-described "friend to Methodists," this pamphlet uses John Wesley's writings to critique Methodism in nineteenth-century America (particularly the chaotic nature of Methodist camp-meetings, the hypocrisy of Methodist ministers, and the legitimacy of Methodist beliefs--particularly about the trinity).

Comment:

This work includes parallels with various aspects of the restoration, including the articles of faith and the importance of American democracy. Although this work was published in the United States and includes sympathetic references to the American revolution, it seems likely that the author lived the first portion of his life in England. Referring to himself as "a Northamptonshire Farmer," Sharman had previously published three tracts near London, including A Letter on the doctrine of the trinity (London, 1795), A caution against trinitarianism (Market-Harborough, 1799), and A second caution against trinitarianism (Market-Harborough, 1800). The Worldcat and Eureka databases do not indicate the author's birth or death and there is no reference to him in either the American Biographical Archive, the Dictionary of National Biography, or the British Biographical Archive (though the latter indicates that there was a prominent family of Sharmans living in Northampton during this period of time).

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):

Highlighting the chaos and disorder of Methodist meetings, Sharman cites a poem that describes both an apostasy and restoration.

"I went to hear preaching, to learn from such teaching,
"But found little there worth learning or praising:
"Such groaning and shouting, it set me a doubting,
"That all such religion is mere human raising.
"The preachers were stamping, the people were jumping
"And screaming so loud that I nothing could hear.
"Some singing, some screeching [sic], what powerful preaching
"If virtue be order, not much was seen there.
"Amidst such distraction, no time for reflection,
"I wonder for my part, how any could pray:
"The men they were bawling, the women were squalling,
"As though they design'd to throw reason away.
"Such horrid distortion can't be true religion,
"Sure 'tis something new that has never been seen,
"For, the sacred pages which speak of all ages,
"Do no where declare that such ever has been.
"St. Paul Christ invested, and he hath protested
"'Gainst all disorder in the house of the Lord;
"Such frantic commotions defile pure devotions,
"For who can be solemn where all is discord.
"To see some behaving, like drunkards, or raving
"And lying and roling [sic] prostrate on the ground;
"Such extreme confusion appears like delusions:
"Some hearts and some heads must be very unsound.
"In Jesus the saviour was no such behaviour,
"All his words and his actions were founded on reason,
"His piety wise, without passion or noise,
"And no frantic motions in all his devotions,
"But always serene and in proper season.
"Let Christ's pure example, be a perfect sample,
"Then his gospel order would soon be restored.
"All clamor and rant wise men would recant,
"And no bedlam distractions, disgrace such transactions,
"But Christ highly honored, and God wisely adored (13)."

Defoe discusses astronomy and the existence of plural worlds when he discusses the flight of Satan's hosts after their expulsion from God's presence in the pre-existence. "Nor need we fly to the dreams of our astronomers, who took a great deal of pains to fill up the vast spaces of the starry heavens with innumerable habitable worlds; allowing as many solar systems as there are fixed stars, and that not only in the known constellations, but even in the galaxy itself; who to every such system allow a certain number of planets, and to every one of those planets so many satellites or moons, and all these planets or moons to be worlds; solid, dark, opaque bodies, habitable, and (as they would have us believe) inhabited by the like animals and rational creatures as on this earth . . . . But, I say, we need not fly to these shifts, or consult the astronomers in the decision of this point; for wherever Satan and his defeated host went at their expulsion from heaven, we think we are certain none of all these beautiful worlds, or be they worlds or no, I mean the fixed stars, planets, &c; had then any existence; for the beginning, as the Scripture calls it, was not yet begun" (65-66).
Hinton attempts to explain the reference to baptism for the dead in 1 Corinthians 15:29: "The phrase 'baptized for the dead' has been the subject of much controversy among commentators. Dr. Doddridge, the soundness of whose judgment is ordinarily equal to the extent of his research, prefers 'in the room of the dead.' Macknight thus paraphrases the passage:--'What shall they do who are immersed in sufferings for testifying the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not at all?' He adds in a note, 'Baptism being an emblematical representation of the death, burial, and resurrection, not only of Christ, but of all mankind, it was fitly made the rite of initiation into the Christian church; and the person who received it, thereby publicly professing his belief of the resurrection of Christ and of the dead, might with the greatest propriety be said to have been baptized for the dead; that is, for his belief of the resurrection of the dead'' (114-115).
Prescott discusses European attempts to explain Quetzalcoatl, the bearded, white God of the Aztecs. "But none of the deities of the country [Mexico] suggested such astonishing analogies with Scripture as Quetzalcoatl, with whom the reader has already been made acquainted. He was the white man, wearing a long beard, who came from the East; and who, after presiding over the golden age of Anahuac, disappeared as mysteriously as he had come, on the great Atlantic Ocean. As he promised to return as some future day, his reappearance was looked for with confidence by each succeeding generation. There is little in these circumstances to remind one of Christianity. But the curious antiquaries of Mexico found out, that to this god were to be referred the institution of ecclesiastical communities, reminding one of the monastic societies of the Old World; that of the rites of confession and penance; and the knowledge even of the great doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation! One party, with pious industry, accumulated proofs to establish his identity with the Apostle St. Thomas; while another, with less scrupulous faith, saw, in his anticipated advent to regenerate the nation, the type, dim-veiled, of the Messiah!" (vol. 3, 382-383).

Nature of Source: Originally published in 1840, Hinton's work traces the history of baptism from antiquity to the nineteenth century. Born in Oxford, England, on July 4, 1799, Hinton spent the first part of his life working as a printer and publisher. The son of an English Baptist minister, he joined his father's congregation at the age of twenty-two and subsequently followed in his father's footsteps. He emigrated to the United States in 1832 and worked as a Baptist minister in Richmond, Virginia (1834), Chicago, Illinois
In discussing John the Baptist, Hinton uses the term "dispensation" to differentiate between Jewish and Christian periods.

"To avoid the natural and inevitable consequence, that the Christian dispensation cannot possibly be supposed to retrograde, and to become more Judaic in its fuller development, paedobaptists generally deny that John was the 'beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ' . . ." (70)

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Morris-Town
Publisher: Henry P. Russell
Date of Publication: 1804
Library Location: HBLL BX7230 B4 1804 (stacks)
Nature of Source: Originally published in Boston in 1750, this work includes a preface by Jonathan Edwards. The work's author, Joseph Bellamy, was a minister who lived in Bethlehem, Connecticut. His book consists of two very long discourses. The first focuses on the nature of God's love; the second examines the practical nature of the gospel.
Comment: This work includes allusions to various beliefs and doctrines regarding the fall of Adam, dispensations, happiness, apostasy and restoration. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages):
While alluding to the Mosaic Law in a discussion of Adam's Fall, Bellamy uses the term "dispensation" to refer to an earlier period of world history.
"Under the Jewish dispensation, it was ordained (Lev. xvi.) that Aaron should lay both his hands upon the head of the live-goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness . . . We used to think scripture has taught us, in express language, that the iniquities of us all were laid on him . . . But if God has not authority to constitute one to stand and act in the room of another, this must all be void and of none effect: And thus, while men are disputing against the original constitution with Adam [i.e., saying that they are not responsible for Adam's transgression], they, unawares, undermine this second constitution [with Christ], which is the foundation of all our hopes" (268-269).

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Philadelphia
Publisher: Kimber, Conrad & Co.
Date of Publication: 1805
Library Location: HBLL 080 Sh64a no. 7951 (microfiche)
Nature of Source: Barclay was born in Scotland in 1648 and educated in France. He joined the Society of Friends (Quakers) in 1666 after returning to Scotland from his educational experiences on the continent. He published the Theses Theologicae (1675) as part of a public debate in Aberdeen and soon thereafter published his Apology (1678). Written originally in Latin and English, the Apology was translated into a number of languages (High and Low Dutch, French and Spanish) and became a standard statement on Quaker beliefs. Placing its emphasis on the "inner light" of the believer, the Apology argues against traditional Christianity (Catholicism and Protestantism), asserting that neither the church nor the scriptures could claim completeness. Ultimate authority, according to Barclay, resided in the personal workings of the Holy Spirit.

Comment: This work contains pertinent material on baptism, dispensations, apostasy, restoration, and the freedom to worship according to one's own conscience. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
Barclay alludes to the concept of different dispensations in order to discount the necessity of baptism.
"But to make water-baptism a necessary institution of the Christian religion, which is pure and spiritual, and not carnal and ceremonial, is to derogate from the new covenant dispensation, and set up the legal rites and ceremonies of which this of baptism, or washing, with water, was one, as appears from Heb. ix. 10. where the apostle speaking thereof saith, that it stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed until the time of reformation. If then the time of reformation, or the dispensation of the gospel, which puts an end to the shadows, be come, then such baptisms and carnal ordinances are no more to be imposed" (438-439).

Nature of Source: Written as a "help to wavering Christians," this work stages a trial of the apostles to argue that Christ was, in fact, resurrected three days after his death. Little is available at BYU on the author John Hewson (who wrote this book under the pseudonym "Onesimus"). He is not listed in the American Biographical Archive, though a list of some of his publications can be found in L.H. Wright's American Fiction, 1774-1850 (San Marino: Huntington Library, 1969). Hewson's publications include an apparently semi-autobiographical work entitled The Doctrine of the New Birth, Exemplified in the Life and Religious Experience of Onesimus (Philadelphia: William F. Rackliff, 1839), but unfortunately this publication is not available at BYU. It seems likely that Hewson was Baptist by affiliation (at least in 1835). (Worldcat indicates that he was the author of An Oration, pronounced on the twenty-fifth of December, 1835, on the character, nature and attributes of Jesus Christ in the Second Baptist Meeting House, of Philadelphia [Philadelphia: S.W. Neall, 1836]).

Excerpt (pages):
While discussing the deaths of two individuals, Lady Jane Grey and Colonel James Gardiner, Murray makes reference to the eternal nature of marriage.
"On the day of her [Lady Jane Grey's] execution, her husband, Lord Guildford [who was also to be executed], desired permission to see her; but she refused her consent, and sent him word, that the tenderness of their parting would overcome the fortitude of both, and would too much unbend their minds from that constancy, which their approaching end required. Their separation, she said, would be only for a moment; and they would soon rejoin each other in a scene where their affections would be for ever united, and where death, disappointments, and misfortunes, could no longer have access to them, or disturb their eternal felicity" (74).
"In the year 1745, he [Colonel James Gardiner] was ordered to repair to Stirling, to assist in subduing the rebellion. It was in the castle of that place, that his wife and eldest daughter enjoyed the last happy hours of his company: about eight or ten days before his death, he parted from them there. A remarkable circumstance attended the separation. His wife was so affected when she took her last leave of him, that she burst into a flood of tears, and betrayed other marks of unusual emotion. When he asked her the reason, she urged, as a sufficient apology, the apprehensions she had of losing so invaluable a friend, amidst the dangers to which he was then called. She took particular notice, that though he had generally comforted her on such occasions, by reminding her of that remarkable hand of Providence, which had so frequently, in former instances, been exerted for his preservation, even in the greatest extremity, he said nothing of it now; but only replied, in his sententious manner, 'We have an eternity to spend together.'--He was killed in the battle of Preston-Pans, in the 57th year of his age" (242-243).

Defoe's discussion of Adam, Eve, and the Fall is useful inasmuch as it provides a cultural and intellectual context for relevant beliefs during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (but not because it parallels church doctrine).

"But to go back to the method the Devil took with the first of mankind: it is plain the policy of hell was right, though the execution of the resolves they took did not fully answer their end neither; for Satan fastening upon poor, proud, ridiculous mother Eve, as I have said before, made presently a true judgment of her capacities, and of her temper; took her by the right hand, and soothing her vanity (which is this day the softest place in the head of all the sex), wheedled her out of her senses by praising her beauty, and promising to make her a goddess.

"The foolish woman presently; and that, we are told, is the reason why the same method so strangely takes with all her posterity, viz. that you are sure to prevail with them, if you can but once persuade them that you believe that they are witty and handsome; for the Devil you may observe, never quits any hold he gets; and having once found a way into the heart, always takes care to keep the door open, that any of his agents may enter after him without any more difficulty. Hence the same argument, espically [sic] the last, has so bewitching an influence on the sex, that they rarely deny you any thing after they are but weak enough, and vain enough to accept of the praises you offer them on that head. On the other hand, you are sure they never forgive you the unpardonable crime of saying they are ugly or disagreeable. It is suggested, that the first method the Devil took to insinuate all those fine things into Eve's giddy head, was by creeping close to her one night, when she was asleep and laying his mouth to her ear, whispering all the fine things to her, which he knew would set her fancy on tip toe, and so make her receive them involuntarily into her mind: knowing well enough, that when she had formed such ideas in her soul, however they came there, she would never be quiet till she had worked them up to some extraordinary thing or other . . . . Well might she be said to be the weaker vessel, though Adam himself had little enough to say for his being the stronger of the two, when he was over persuaded (if it was done by persuasion) by his wife to the same thing" (83-85)

Title of Book: Scriptural View of the Wine-Question
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York, NY
Library Location: BS680 W55 (HBLL)
Publisher: Leavitt, Trow & Company
Date of Publication: 1848
Nature of Source: In this small pamphlet Moses Stuart purportedly examines every reference to "wine" and "strong drink" in the Bible. Reasoning that the corresponding Hebrew terms "ya-yin" and "shay-cawr" were generic words that could be used to represent either fermented or unfermented drinks, Stuart concludes that biblical references to wine and strong drinks actually connote unfermented grape juice.
Comment: The papers of Moses Stuart at Andover contain letters from Joshua Seixas (who taught Hebrew at the School of the Prophets in Kirtland) pointing out mistakes in Stuart's Grammar of the Hebrew Language (see Robert Samuel Fletcher, History of Oberlin College, vol. 1, p. 370, n. 76). Whether or not this explicit connection to Seixas is significant, Stuart's pamphlet includes a number of parallels with various parts of the Word of Wisdom (see separate entry). In addressing the scriptural treatment of alcohol, Stuart turns to a biblical question that is similarly ambiguous: Does deity have parts and passions? Stuart's treatment of this question is significant, not because it parallels the teachings of Joseph Smith, but rather because it does not.
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages):
Stuart maintains that God has neither parts nor passions. Those who believe otherwise are "mere dreamers" (48).
"[B]y nature God is a spirit; but, on the other hand, to God are ascribed hands, feet, eyes, mouth, in a word, all the parts, and even the passions and affections, of mortal men. Now it must be, that one of these descriptions cannot be literally true, in case the other is true. From the very nature of the case we spontaneously unite in saying, that the declaration, God is a spirit, is and must be literally true. By this agreement we necessitate ourselves of course to give a tropical or figurative sense to all the other declarations; for 'a spirit hath not flesh or bones.' All declarations of such a tropical nature, then, merely establish the fact, that there are, in God, powers and faculties which have some correspondence or analogy to our own; for it is on such a basis that this language of description rests.

"Thus it is, in respect to all the objects of the invisible world, wherever the language employed is of such a nature as in itself to designate what is material and local. Thus it must be in all cases, where the powers of language, as it now is, are inadequate to give a literal description.

"We pronounce those to be mere dreamers, who, on the ground of such declarations as adverted to, actually assign to the Godhead material parts and passions. We do so, because material form and substance are contrary to his known nature. For ourselves, we do not once even suspect any contradiction or discrepancy, in the two different classes of passages that have respect to the Godhead. All the demands of exegesis are satisfied, when we interpret as tropical all those passages, which, literally understood, would mar the idea of his spiritual nature" (47-48).

Nature of Source: First published anonymously in London in 1726 under a slightly different title (The Political History of the Devil), this book was identified as one of Defoe's works as early as 1753 when it was included in a listing of his publications. The book is divided into two parts. The first traces the history of the Devil's expulsion from heaven, his creation of a kingdom of hell upon the earth, and his reestablishment of this kingdom after the flood. The second examines the history of the Devil's agents (witches, warlocks, etc.), his extensive influence among pagans and various indigenous tribes, and further narrates the world's history to the present day (1726), placing particular emphasis upon the Devil's role in history. Although Defoe sets out to correct mistakes in Milton's Paradise Lost, he draws heavily upon Milton throughout the work. Further information can be found in P.N. Furbank and W.R. Owens, A Critical Bibliography of Daniel Defoe (London: Pickering & Chatto, 1998), pp. 220-221 and Rodney M. Baine, Daniel Defoe and the Supernatural (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1968).
Comment: Donated by Aaron Johnson, this work was part of the Nauvoo Library. Defoe's work contains numerous allusions that parallel various aspects of L.D.S. theology.

Defoe discusses the purpose of creation.
"But it is very reasonable, and indeed probable, that the Devils were more than ordinarily surprised at the nature and reason of all this glorious creation, after they had, with the utmost curiosity, viewed all the parts of it: The glories of the several systems; the immense spaces in which those glorious bodies that were created and made part of it, were allowed respectively to move; the innumerable fixed stars, as so many suns in the centre of so many distant solar systems; the (likewise innumerable) dark opaque bodies receiving lights, and depending upon those suns respectively for such light, and then reflecting that light again upon, and for the use of one another: To see the beauty and splendour of their forms, the regularity of their position, the order and exactness, and yet inconceivable velocity of their motions, the certainty of their revolutions, and the variety and virtue of their influences; and then, which was even to the Devils themselves most astonishing, that after all the rest of their observations, they should find this whole immense work was adapted for, and made subservient to the use, delight, and blessing, only of one poor species, in itself small, and in appearance contemptible: the meanest of all the kinds supposed to inhabit so many glorious worlds, as appeared now to be formed: I mean that moon called the earth, and the creature called man; that all was made for him, upheld by the wise Creator, on his account only: and would necessarily end and cease whenever that species should end, and be determined" (71-72).

Nature of Source: Originally published in Boston in 1750, this work includes a preface by Jonathan Edwards. The work's author, Joseph Bellamy, was a minister who lived in Bethlem, Connecticut. His book consists of two very long discourses. The first focuses on the nature of God's love; the second examines the practical nature of the gospel.
Comment: This work includes allusions to various beliefs and doctrines regarding the fall of Adam, dispensations, happiness, apostasy and restoration. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
Bellamy disputes the notion that happiness is God's purpose for man. "How God's putting Adam into a state of trial was consistent with his aiming merely at his happiness as his last end, I cannot understand: Sure I am, it must have been better, unspeakably better, for Adam, his interest only considered, to have been immediately confirmed in a state of perfect holiness and happiness, without running such an awful venture of eternal ruin and destruction: Nor is there any man on earth that would choose, rather than into a state of confirmed holiness and happiness, such as the saints in heaven are now in: and, therefore, I cannot but think that God had a greater regard to something else, than to Adam's happiness. In this instance, it seems plain, from fact, that God does not make his creatures' happiness his last end . . . And if God's putting his creatures into a state of trial is not consistent with his aiming merely at their happiness as his last end, then the whole tenor of God's moral government is not consistent therewith: for, from first to last, it has been his way to put his creatures into a state of trial; even all his creatures who were capable of moral government" (322-323).

Nature of Source: A native of Pennsylvania, Lindley Murray settled in England in 1784. He was widely known for his English Grammar (1795), English Reader (1799), and an English Spelling Book (1804). His Power of Religion on the Mind, in Retirement, Affliction, and at the Approach of Death, narrates how distinguished individuals conceived their own mortality and eventual demise.

Comment: The tenth edition of this work (New York: I. Collins and Son, 1802) was contained in the Manchester Library. It includes allusions to such subjects as dispensations, the fate of those without the gospel, eternal marriage, and the nature of happiness. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Quoting from the will of Elizabeth Carter, Murray implicitly links happiness to the purpose of creation.
"In the solemn act of making one's last will, something surely ought to be added to the mere forms of law. Upon this occasion, which is a kind of taking leave of the world, I acknowledge, with gratitude and thanksgiving, how much I owe to the Divine Goodness, for a life distinguished by innumerable and unmerited blessings.
"Next to God, the supreme and original author of all happiness, I desire to express my thankfulness to those whom he has made the instruments of conveying his benefits to me" (352).

Nature of Source: Originally published in 1840, Hinton's work traces the history of baptism from antiquity to the nineteenth century. Born in Oxford, England, on July 4, 1799, Hinton spent the first part of his life working as a printer and publisher. The son of an English Baptist minister, he joined his father's congregation at the age of twenty-two and subsequently followed in his father's footsteps. He emigrated to the United States in 1832 and worked as a Baptist minister in Richmond, Virginia (1834), Chicago, Illinois (1835-1841), St. Louis, Missouri (1841-1844), and New Orleans, Louisiana (1844-1847). He died of yellow fever in 1847.
Comment: Donated by an unknown source, this work was contained in the Nauvoo Library. This work is generally about baptism, but there are references to other relevant subjects, e.g., dispensations, apostasy, Israel, the translation of scripture, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages):
Although the entire work is about baptism, the following excerpts about infant baptism, the link between baptism and the Lord's supper, and the proper mode of baptism are particularly relevant.
"Having selected from the writings of the Fathers all the passages relating to baptism in the third century, and as many as are necessary to prove its commencement in the Roman and Greek churches in the fourth century, and its extensive prevalence in the fifth, it may be well to remind the reader that the works, in whole or in part, of more than forty Fathers have come down to us; and that, while they are replete with allusions to the baptism of adults, until the time of Augustine (and all but five of them lived before or during his time) there are only a few passages in three or four of them that are claimed to relate to infant baptism; and that all who preceded the fourth century, excepting Origen, and Cyprian, have been shown to have no reference to babes. Is it possible that this could be the state of the case, if the practice of infant baptism had been universal from the time of the apostles?" (262-263).

"In the preceding chapters it has been clearly proved, that infant baptism has neither the command of Christ, the practice of the apostles, nor the sanction of the ancient church during the first two centuries" (310).

"The history of infant baptism, as exhibited in the pages of this volume, has clearly identified it with the Judaizing [sic] principles--the formalizing tendency--the terrifying doctrines--the absurd ceremonies--and, above all, the priestcraft-policy, which resulted in the establishment of Popery" (348).

"Such are the follies which have been introduced in lieu of the gloriously simple ordinance of baptism, as instituted by our Lord and practised by his apostles. It will be observed, however, that, whatever childish additions the ancients made to baptism, they never separated it from the Lord's supper" (302).

"It is as needless as it would be endless, to multiply quotations from the Fathers relating to the universality of the practice of immersion, excepting only in case of danger of death" (158).

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Philadelphia
Publisher: Kimber, Conrad & Co.
Date of Publication: 1805
Library Location: HBLL 080 Sh64a no. 7951 (microfiche)
Nature of Source: Barclay was born in Scotland in 1648 and educated in France. He joined the Society of Friends (Quakers) in 1666 after returning to Scotland from his educational experiences on the continent. He published the Theses Theologicae (1675) as part of a public debate in Aberdeen and soon thereafter published his Apology (1678). Written originally in Latin and English, the Apology was translated into a number of languages (High and Low Dutch, French and Spanish) and became a standard statement on Quaker beliefs. Placing its emphasis on the "inner light" of the believer, the Apology argues against traditional Christianity (Catholicism and Protestantism), asserting that neither the church nor the scriptures could claim completeness. Ultimate authority, according to Barclay, resided in the personal workings of the Holy Spirit.
Comment: This work contains pertinent material on baptism, dispensations, apostasy, restoration, and the freedom to worship according to one's own conscience. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
This work includes various references to baptism that are both similar and different from LDS beliefs. Barclay is not only against infant baptism but also against any required baptism by water.

"The Papists again use this opinion [that the sins of a father are passed on to his children] as an art to augment the esteem of their church, and reverence of its sacraments, seeing they pretend it is washed away by baptism; only in this they appear to be a little more merciful, in that they send not these unbaptised infants to hell, but to a certain limbus, concerning which the scriptures are as silent as of the other. This then is not only not authorised in the scriptures, but contrary to the express tenor of them. The apostle saith plainly, Rom. iv. 15. 'Where no law is, there is no transgression.' And again, v. 13. 'But sin is not imputed, where there is no law'" (118).

"As to the baptism of infants, it is a mere human tradition, for which neither precept nor practice is to be found in all the scripture" (423).

"Of these sacraments (so called) baptism is always first numbered, which is the subject of the present proposition; in whose explanation I shall first demonstrate and prove our judgment, and then answer the objections, and refute the sentiments of our opposers. As to the first part, these things following which are briefly comprehended in the proposition, come to be proposed and proved.

"First: There is but one baptism, as well as but one Lord, one faith, &c.

"Secondly, That this one baptism, which is the baptism of Christ, is not a washing with, or dipping in water, but a being baptized by the Spirit.

"Thirdly, That the baptism of John was but a figure of this; and therefore, as the figure, to give place to the substance; which though it be to continue, yet the other ceaseth" (427-428).

"As for the latter part of the thesis, denying the use of infant-baptism, it necessarily follows from what is said above. For if water-baptism be ceased, then surely baptizing of infants is not warrantable" (458).

Written as a "help to wavering Christians," this work stages a trial of the apostles to argue that Christ was, in fact, resurrected three days after his death. Little is available at BYU on the author John Hewson (who wrote this book under the pseudonym "Onesimus"). He is not listed in the American Biographical Archive, though a list of some of his publications can be found in L.H. Wright's American Fiction, 1774-1850 (San Marino: Huntington Library, 1969). Hewson's publications include an apparently semi-autobiographical work entitled The Doctrine of the New Birth, Exemplified in the Life and Religious Experience of Onesimus (Philadelphia: William F. Rackliff, 1839), but unfortunately this publication is not available at BYU. It seems likely that Hewson was Baptist by affiliation (at least in 1835). (Worldcat indicates that he was the author of An Oration, pronounced on the twenty-fifth of December, 1835, on the character, nature and attributes of Jesus Christ in the Second Baptist Meeting House, of Philadelphia [Philadelphia: S.W. Neall, 1836]).

Later he includes a picture of a ship on the sea sailing toward three people on three faraway hills. Underneath the picture is the following caption: "Captain Onesimus [Hewson], sendeth greeting to the remnant of the twelve tribes, which are scattered abroad on the face of the earth" (419).

In arguing against similarities between baptism and circumcision, Hinton discusses the literal redemption of Israel.

"The position I maintain is, that the Abrahamic covenant has never been abrogated; and that, in fact, the seal of that covenant has been punctually fulfilled on the part of the Jews to the present day: that, consequently, under that covenant their title to the land is still valid, and that the time is rapidly hastening when their actual re-occupancy of it will terminate this dispute . . . . The restoration of the Jews, which the apostle affirms will be 'as life from the dead,' will probably be the main instrumentality for healing the divisions of the church, as well as for successfully disseminating the gospel among the heathen . . . ." Worldcat indicates that the author, Thomas Brown, was born in 1766 but does not list a death date. I could not find any other biographical information on Brown. (He is not listed in the American Biographical Archive.) An advertisement at the end of the work indicates that Brown had previously published an Account of the People Called Shakers which was well-received by at least two nineteenth-century scholars: Timothy Dwight and Benjamin Silliman. (The advertisement includes extracts from Dwight's Travels and Silliman's Tour from Hartford to Quebec, describing this history in laudatory terms.) It is evident from the advertisement that the author had once been a Shaker but had subsequently become disaffected.

Comment: The work has a number of pertinent references to LDS doctrine regarding Israel, sectarian strife, apostasy, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
Various portions of the text discuss the scattering, preservation, and restoration of Israel, the ten tribes, etc. The following excerpts are but a few examples:

"The Jews settled in China some time before Christ, probably one hundred years; they not only increased in number and wealth, but were distinguished for their literature, and raised to offices, being governors of provinces, and mandarins. By degrees their affairs began to decline, and many embraced the Mahometan religion.

"In 1704, father Gozani, a Jewish missionary, had the curiosity to investigate the state of the Jews in the China empire . . . . The Jews informed Gozani that their ancestors came from the west, from the kingdom of Judea, which Joshua conquered after they left Egypt; had crossed the Red Sea; traversed the desert; and that the number of Jews who left Egypt amounted to six hundred thousand. They also gave him to understand that they had formerly been numerous in the empire, but were then reduced to only seven families. They form alliances with each other, and never connect themselves with the other inhabitants of China" (164-165).

"To quote all the [biblical] passages which thus speak of their dispersion and sufferings, all which have been clearly fulfilled, would take up many pages. But we will leave this sorrowful subject, and 'turn from sorrow to joy, from mourning to a good day, days of fasting and joy, and we will see that the Lord hath not forgotten his people nor cast them off forever.

"To the consolation of the Jews, and all others, there are abundant more prophecies of their restoration and happiness, than of their dispersion and misery. The prophets are full on this delightful subject, and when they begin, it appears as if they were in raptures, and hardly know when to stop . . . " (232-233).

"Though from the destruction of Jerusalem to the seventeenth century, there are few countries, in which they [the Jews] have not been successively banished, recalled, and again expelled; yet they have never been banished from one country without finding an asylum in another . . . One of the great designs of their being preserved, and continued a distinct people, appears to be, that their singular destiny might confirm the divine authority of the gospel, which they reject, and that they might strengthen the faith of others in these sacred truths, to which they refuse to yield their own consent.

"I can hardly pass by taking some notice, how remarkable the providence of God has been, in the destruction of the enemies of the Jews, as well as in their preservation . . ." (212).

"Although the Jews profess to know nothing certain as to the real place of the abode of the ten tribes: yet they say, that they are lost only in name, and that they will be restored together with Judah and Benjamin; and likewise all those who have embraced Christianity, or Mahometanism, will then return to the religion of their fathers; that their nation, thus restored and united, shall never again go into captivity, nor ever be subjected to any power; but on the contrary, they believe that all the nations on earth shall therefore be under their dominion; Judea will then become fruitful as formerly; Jerusalem will be built on its ancient ground, and the real descendants of the priests and Levites, will be reinstated in their respective offices, although they may have been forced to apostatize. Then likewise will be restored the spirit of prophecy, the ark and cherubim, fire from heaven, &c. the same as their fathers enjoined in the tabernacle, in the wilderness, and in Solomon's temple. Such is the expectation of the Jews in regard to the Messiah, and his kingdom, which they still assert to be not of a spiritual, but of a temporal nature" (218). "If I was to learn, that the way was opened for the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and that they were flocking thither and rebuilding of it, and settling again in Judea, I should conclude that the millennium would soon commence; and so would thousands of others . . . As bishop Newton says, 'What hath already been accomplished is a sufficient pledge, and earnest of what is yet to come, and we have all imaginable reason to believe, since so many of the prophecies are fulfilled, that the remaining prophecies will be fulfilled also, and that there will be a great harvest of the nations. And the Jews in God's good time, be restored to their native city and country . . .'' (238).

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York, NY

Date of Publication: 1848
Nature of Source: In this small pamphlet Moses Stuart purportedly examines every reference to "wine" and "strong drink" in the Bible. Reasoning that the corresponding Hebrew terms "ya-yin" and "shay-cawr" were generic words that could be used to represent either fermented or unfermented drinks, Stuart concludes that biblical references to wine and strong drinks actually connote unfermented grape juice.

Comment: The papers of Moses Stuart at Andover contain letters from Joshua Seixas (who taught Hebrew at the School of the Prophets in Kirtland) pointing out mistakes in Stuart's Grammar of the Hebrew Language (see Robert Samuel Fletcher, History of Oberlin College, vol. 1, p. 370, n. 76). Whether or not this explicit connection to Seixas is significant, Stuart's pamphlet includes a number of parallels with various parts of the Word of Wisdom (see separate entry). Additionally, Stuart briefly addresses the nature of truth.

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages):
In addressing whether or not unfermented grape juice naturally contains a small portion of alcohol, Stuart briefly discusses the all-encompassing nature of truth.

Excerpt (pages):

The entirety of this work is related to the Devil. In the following excerpt, Defoe gives an account of Lucifer's origins.

"It is agreed by all writers, as well sacred as prophane, that this creature we now call a Devil, was originally an angel of light, a glorious seraph; perhaps the choicest of all the glorious Seraphs . . . . Hence that notion (and not ill founded); namely that the first cause of disgrace, and on which ensued his rebellion, was occasioned upon God's proclaiming his son generalissimo, and, with himself, supreme ruler in heaven: giving the dominion of all his works of creation, as well already finished, as not then begun, to him; which post of honour (say they) Satan expected to be conferred on himself, as next in honour, majesty and power, to God the supreme . . . . In a word, Satan withdrew with all his followers malcontent and chagrin, resolved to disobey this new command, and not yield obedience to the Son . . . . Be their number as it is, numberless millions, and legions of millions, that is no part of my present enquiry, Satan the leader, guide and Superior, as he was author of the celestial rebellion, is still the great head and master Devil as before; under his authority they still act, not obeying, but carrying on the same insurrection against God which they began in heaven; making war still against heaven, in the person of his image and creature man: and though vanquished by the thunder of the Son of God, and cast down headlong from heaven, they have yet reassumed, or rather not lost, either the will or the power of doing evil" (21-23).

Nature of Source: Published in 1843, Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico is one of the great historical narrative of the nineteenth century. Drawing extensively upon early Spanish accounts, Prescott documents the rise and fall of Aztec civilization

Comment: Prescott's description of ancient Mexico includes allusions to a number of relevant subjects regarding ancient civilizations, sectarian strife, the modern recapitulation of biblical events, pre-Columbian migrations to the Americas, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages): Prescott discusses how the Spanish saw the recapitulation of biblical events in the history of the Aztecs.

"The ingenuity of the [Spanish] chronicler was taxed to find out analogies between the Aztec and Scripture histories, both old and new. The migration from Aztlan to Anahuac was typical of the Jewish exodus. The places, where the Mexicans halted on the march, were identified with those in the journey of the Israelites; and the name of Mexico itself was found to be nearly identical with the Hebrew name for the Messiah. The Mexican hieroglyphics afforded a boundless field for the display of this critical acuteness. The most remarkable passages in the Old and New Testaments were read in their mysterious characters; and the eye of faith could trace there the whole story of the Passion, the Saviour suspended from the cross, and the Virgin Mary with her attendant angels!
"The Jewish and the Christian schemes were strangely mingled together, and the brains of the good fathers were still further bewildered by the mixture of heathenish abominations, which were so closely intertwined with the most orthodox observances. In their perplexity, they looked on the whole as the delusion of the Devil who counterfeited the rites of Christianity and the traditions of the chosen people, that he might allure his wretched victims to their own destruction" (vol. 3, 387-388).

Excerpt (pages): Dona Marina, Cortes' native interpreter and mistress, was a princess who had been sold into slavery at a young age by her family. Years later she would see them again. Bernal Diaz compares the familial reunion to the story of Joseph in Egypt. "The young native who was baptized by the name of Donna Marina, and who rendered such essential services in the sequel, was the daughter of the chief or Prince of Painala, a powerful lord who had several districts subject to him, eight leagues from Guacacualco. He dying while this lady was an infant, his widow married another chief, a young man, by whom she had a son whom they determined to place in succession after them. They therefore gave this girl to certain Indians of Xicalango to carry off secretly, and caused it to be rumoured that she was dead; which report they corroborated by taking the advantage of the death of a child about her age, the daughter of a slave. The people of Xicalango gave her to those of Tabasco, and the latter to Cortes . . . . Donna Marina had by her birth an universal influence and consequence through these countries; she was of a fine figure, frank manners, prompt genius, and intrepid spirit; an excellent linguist, and of most essential service to Cortes whom she always accompanied. I was acquainted with her mother, and her half brother, who was at the time I knew him grown up; they governed their territory conjointly, the second husband being also dead. They were afterwards baptized, the mother by the name of Marta, the son by the name of Lazarus; this I know, for in the expedition to Higueras, when Cortes passed through Guacacualco, he summoned all the neighbouring chiefs to meet him in that settlement; and amongst many others came the mother, and half brother of this lady . . . Both the old lady and her son were terrified, thinking that they were sent for to be put to death, and cried bitterly, but Donna Marina dried their tears, saying, that she forgave them, that at the time they sent her from them they were ignorant of what they did; and that she thanked God, who had taken her from the worship of idols to the true church, and was happier in having a son by her lord and master Cortes, and in being married to a cavalier like her husband, than if she had been sovereign of all the provinces of New Spain. All this I heard with my own ears, and swear to the truth thereof. Amen. At parting she gave them a very handsome present of gold, and thus dismissed them. This story brings to my mid that of Joseph in Egypt, when his brothers were in his power." (79-80)

Excerpt (pages): Throughout his narrative, Bernal Diaz makes numerous references to native history and religion (see especially pp. 160-182). The following excerpt is a sample, contrasting the greatness of Mexico before the conquest with its subsequent state fifty years later.
"When we beheld the number of populous towns on the water and firm ground, and that broad causeway running straight and level to the city we could compare it to nothing but the enchanted scenes we had read of in Amadis of Gaul, from the great towers and temples, and other edifices of lime and stone which seemed to rise out of the water. To many of us it appeared doubtful whether we were asleep or awake; nor is the manner in which I express myself to be wondered at, for it must be considered, that never yet did man see, hear, or dream of any thing equal to the spectacle which appeared to our eyes on this day . . . . When I beheld the scenes that were around me, I thought within myself that this was the garden of the world! This place, was at the time of which I am speaking with one half of the houses in the water, and the other half on dry land; but all is destroyed, and that which was a lake is now a tract of fields of Indian corn, and so entirely altered that the natives themselves could hardly know it" (160-161).

Nature of Source: As one of the first American women to succeed in a literary career, Lydia Howard Sigourney published 67 books and more than 1000 articles. Her writings particularly relied on sentimental conventions to treat moral and religious themes. The poem in question traces the history of cross-cultural encounters between Europeans and native Americans, often drawing upon historical events in the Old World to describe events in the Americas. Nearly a third of the book is devoted to footnotes (183-284). These clarify the broad historical allusions described in verse.

Comment: This poem is extremely long and flowery (181 pp). Because its poetical approach is full of broad and general allusions, it often seems to never really say anything at all. In this sense, the author's footnotes are far more useful to the cultural historian than the poem's text. The author frequently makes comparisons between native Americans and events from the Old and New Testaments (particularly the former). However, these comparisons are nearly always metaphorical in nature and are not intended to link ancient Israel to the Americas. Except for the extensive quotations excerpted below, there is little of significance in this work.

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
In discussing the religious superstitions of various native Americans, the author makes an explicit comparison with ancient Israel.

"In various forms arose
Their superstitious homage. Some with blood
Of human sacrifices sought to appease
That anger, which in pestilence, or dearth,
Or famine stalk'd; and their astonish'd vales
Like Carthaginian altars, frequently drank
The horrible libation. Some, with fruits,
Sweet flowers, and incense of their choicest herbs,
Sought to propitiate HIM, whose powerful hand
Unseen, sustain'd them. Some with mystic rites,
The ark, the orison, the paschal feast,
As in some broken vase, the smother'd coals,
Scatter'd from Jewish altars.
Let the heart,
That deems such semblance but the baseless dream
Of blind credulity, survey the trace
Of similarity, bid Truth's clear light Beam o'er the misty annal, note the facts,
And answer for itself" (7-8).

This general comparison between ancient Israel and native Americans is expanded in a corresponding footnote.

"Such a marked diversity of customs and religious rites, is found among the aborigines of America, that they must be considered as the mingled offspring of different nations, who in various ages have become inhabitants of this western hemisphere. The Peruvians, in their ancient offerings, like a sect of the Persians, recognized the Sun as the Parent of their joys, and the supreme object of their adoration. Some of the eastern tribes of South America preserve a tradition that their ancestors migrated from the African continent. The Toltecas, originally bordering upon Mexico and celebrated for their superiour knowledge, which comprised some branches of agriculture, together with the art of cutting gems, and casting gold and silver into various forms, possessed some ancient paintings, which represented the passage of their ancestors through Asia, and the north-western countries of America. The Mexicans who, in the barbarity of their religious sacrifices, point to the blood-stained altars of Carthage, in the style of their architecture, the construction of pyramidal edifices, the use of hieroglyphicks, and the mode of computing time, lead us back to the institutions of ancient Egypt. This similarity has so forcibly impressed the minds of some learned writers, particularly Siguenza, and Bishop Huet, that they have designated the Mexicans as the descendants of Naphtahim (sic), the son of Mizraim, and nephew of Ham. The Esquimaux [sic] recognizes his sires in the north of Europe, and by a variety of customs proves his affinity. The Mohawks, from the peculiaritty of their language, composed entirely without labials, so that they never close their lips in speaking, and from the superiority which they assumed over the surrounding tribes, seem also to claim a distinct origin. The Abbe Clavigero supposes that the ancestors of those nations who people the country of Anahuac, passed from the northeastern parts of Asia to the western extremity of America. Amid the variety of customs which distinguish the different tribes, some have been observed so similar to those of ancient Israel, that they have given rise to conjecture, that some of the ten tribes, who, after the Assyrian invasion in 721, (B.C.) were long in a wandering state, might have been allured to pass, with other emigrants, the narrow strait which separates the Old from the New World. This opinion received strength from the circumstance, that among some of the natives the name of their Supreme Being was 'Yohewah,' evidently resembling the Hebrew Jehovah, that the word 'Hallelujah,' occurred in their songs of praise, that they bear upon their shoulders to battle a consecrated Ark, which is never suffered to touch the earth, and the mysteries of whose interior they guard with the most jealous care. Traditions of the murder in Eden, of original longevity, the general deluge, the saving of the righteous pair, the bird sent from the ark, who returned with a verdant branch, the confusion of tongues, the anger of the Great Spirit at the building of a high place, which the pride of man contemplated should reach the heavens, and many more evidently derived from the Scriptures, are preserved among them. Some of the early settlers, who had an opportunity of observing their character before its debasement, traced in their religious offerings and festivals a similarity to the Jewish ritual. Intelligent men, who have resided among them as traders, or surveyed them as travellers (sic) and missionaries, have occasionally gathered traits of resemblance to the peculiar people; and some learned men have been inclined to credit this hypothesis by a comparison of their language with the ancient Hebrew. 'Dr. Buchanan,' says a judicious writer, 'supposes the ten tribes of Israel, to be now in the country of their first captivity; but this by no means precludes the possibility of individuals having migrated northward and eastward to the American continent. He speaks of the white and the black Jews of Asia; and why, since they are scattered, the distinguished people, may there not be red Jews in America?''

"The history of the Aztecs suggests some strong points of resemblance to that of the ancient Romans, not only in their military success but in the policy which led to them" (vol. 1, 21).

"Enough has been said, however, to show that the Aztec and Tezcucan races were advanced in civilization far beyond the wandering tribes of North America. The degree of civilization which they had reached, as inferred by their political institutions, may be considered, perhaps, not much short of that enjoyed by our Saxon ancestors, under Alfred. In respect to the nature of it, they may be better compared with the Egyptians; and the examination of their social relations and culture may suggest still stronger pointed of resemblance to that ancient people" (vol. 1, 49-50).

"One detestable feature of Aztec superstition, however, sunk it far below the Christian. This was its cannibalism; though, in truth, the Mexicans were not cannibals, in the coarsest acceptation of the term. They did not feed on human flesh merely to gratify a brutish appetite, but in obedience to their religion" (vol. 1, 84).

Topics: Pre-Columbian migrations to America
Author: William H. Prescott
Although Prescott is skeptical that there could be an ancient Jewish connection to the Americas, he does believe that similarities between the Old and New World indicate that pre-Columbian migrations to the Americas probably did occur. "But although it is not necessary to resort to this startling supposition [that the Devil anciently counterfeited Christianity in the Americas], nor even to call up an apostle from the dead, or any later missionary, to explain the coincidences with Christianity; yet these coincidences must be allowed to furnish an argument in favor of some primitive communication with that great brotherhood of nations on the old continent, among whom similar ideas have been so widely diffused. The probability of such a communication, especially with Eastern Asia, is much strengthened by the resemblance of sacerdotal institutions, and of some religious rites, as those of marriage, and the burial of the dead; by the practice of human sacrifices, and even of cannibalism, traces of which are discernible in the Mongol races; and, lastly, by a conformity of social usages and manners, so striking that the description of Montezuma's court may well pass for that of the Grand Khan's, as depicted by Maundeville and Marco Polo" (vol. 3, 388-390).

Nature of Source: First published anonymously in London in 1726 under a slightly different title (The Political History of the Devil), this book was identified as one of Defoe's works as early as 1753 when it was included in a listing of his publications. The book is divided into two parts. The first traces the history of the Devil's expulsion from heaven, his creation of a kingdom of hell upon the earth, and his reestablishment of this kingdom after the flood. The second examines the history of the Devil's agents (witches, warlocks, etc.), his extensive influence among pagans and various indigenous tribes, and further narrates the world's history to the present day (1726), placing particular emphasis upon the Devil's role in history. Although Defoe sets out to correct mistakes in Milton's Paradise Lost, he draws heavily upon Milton throughout the work. Further information can be found in P.N. Furbank and W.R. Owens, A Critical Bibliography of Daniel Defoe (London: Pickering & Chatto, 1998), pp. 220-221 and Rodney M. Baine, Daniel Defoe and the Supernatural (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1968).

Comment: Donated by Aaron Johnson, this work was part of the Nauvoo Library. Defoe's work contains numerous allusions that parallel various aspects of L.D.S. theology and belief. These include Lucifer and the Council in Heaven, sectarian strife, apostasy, astronomy, the purpose of creation, etc. (Where appropriate, different doctrinal subjects have been given their own distinct archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
In stark contrast to church doctrine (and to many prevailing thoughts of the day), Defoe makes no connection between ancient Israel and the native inhabitants of the Americas. (If anything, he asserts that Satan was initially responsible for the peopling of the New World.)

"And how came all the communication to be so entirely cut off between the nations of Europe and Africa, from whence America must certainly have been peopled, or else the Devil must have done it indeed? . . . We cannot tell how to give any other rational account of it, that a nation, nay, a quarter of the world, or as some will have it to be, half the globe, should be peopled from Europe or Africa, or both, and no body ever go after them, or come back from them, in above three thousand years after. "Nay, that those countries [the Americas] should be peopled when there was no navigation in use in these parts of the world, no ships made that could carry provisions enough to support the people that sailed in them, but that they must have been starved to death before they could reach the shore of America; the ferry from Europe or Africa in any part (which we have known navigation to be practised in) being at least 1000 miles and in most places more.

"But as to the Americans, let the Devil and them alone to account for their coming thither; this we are certain of, that we knew nothing of them for many a hundred years: and when we did, when the discovery was made, they that went from hence found Satan in a full and quite possession of them, ruling them with an arbitrary government, particular to himself" (86-87).

"[A]ll Asia and Africa are at present overrun with paganism or Mahometanism, which I think of the two is rather the worst; besides all America, a part of the world, as some say, equal in bigness to all the other, in which the Devil's kingdom was never interrupted from its first being inhabited, whenever it was, to the first discovery of it by the European nations in the 16th. century" (132).
Hinton prefaces an examination of infant baptism by discussing the apostasy of the primitive church. "In this [the third] century that state of the church became rapidly corrupt; its bishops were ambitious and tyrannical, and many of its members luxurious and vicious. This statement is fully sustained by all Protestant, and many Catholic writers on ecclesiastical history. It is in the most corrupt portion of the church (the African) in this corrupted age that infant baptism is first discovered" (242-243).
Barclay was born in Scotland in 1648 and educated in France. He joined the Society of Friends (Quakers) in 1666 after returning to Scotland from his educational experiences on the continent. He published the Theses Theologicae (1675) as part of a public debate in Aberdeen and soon thereafter published his Apology (1678). Written originally in Latin and English, the Apology was translated into a number of languages (High and Low Dutch, French and Spanish) and became a standard statement on Quaker beliefs. Placing its emphasis on the "inner light" of the believer, the Apology argues against traditional Christianity (Catholicism and Protestantism), asserting that neither the church nor the scriptures could claim completeness. Ultimate authority, according to Barclay, resided in the personal workings of the Holy Spirit.

Comment: This work contains pertinent material on baptism, dispensations, apostasy, restoration, and the freedom to worship according to one's own conscience. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Excerpt (pages):
Barclay devotes an entire chapter to the importance of religious liberty (500-526).
"Since God hath assumed to himself the power and dominion of the conscience, who alone can rightly instruct and govern it, therefore it is not lawful for any whosoever, by virtue of any authority or principality they bear in the government of this world, to force the consciences of others" (500).

Nature of Source: Written by an anonymous author who refers to himself as "a spectator," this short (11 pp.) pamphlet describes a Methodist camp-meeting held in Bern, N.Y. in early September 1810.

Comment: The author is very critical of camp meetings. In a preface he explains that the purpose of his tract is to "save [the reader] the trouble and expense of going to those midnight howlings," and in his conclusions he calls them "scandalous proceedings [that]..." are not only vicious themselves, but open a door for almost all kinds of vice, and immorality" (2, 11). The pamphlet is useful inasmuch as it highlights the sectarian strife of this period and region.

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages): The author's description highlights the sectarian strife of the period.

"The number of tents on Saturday night was about fifty; and the number of Methodists probably, about four hundred. They were very much opposed to other denominations (or it appeared so by their speeches) and were possessed of a Pharisaic principle, 'who upon opinion of their own godliness despised all others.' They commonly salute the spectators by the name of sinners, or the children of the devil, or some such expression, and many times call names" (10-11).

Defoe treats the syncretic nature of the Jesuit mission to China during this period as a matter of apostasy.
"I might, to complete this part of the history, give you the detail of his progress in these first steps of his alliances with Rome, and add a long list of massacres, wars and expeditions in behalf of religion, which he has had the honour to have a visible hand in . . . all which would most effectually convince us, that the Devil has not been idle in his business: but I may meet with these again in my way; it is enough, while I am upon the generals only, to mention them thus in a summary way; I say, it is enough to prove, that the Devil has really been as much concerned as any body, in the methods taken by some people for propagating the Christian religion in the world . . . . [T]he greatest piece of management which we find the Devil has concerned himself in of late, in the matter of religion, seems to be that of the mission in China; and here indeed Satan has acted his masterpiece . . . . [T]he Jesuit mission being in danger, by the Devil and the Chinese Emperor's joining together . . . [The Jesuit missionaries] cunningly fell in with the ecclesiastics of the country, and joining the priestcraft of both religions together, they brought Jesus Christ and Confucius to be so reconcilable, that the Chinese and Roman Idolatry appeared capable of a confederacy, of going on hand in hand together; and consequently of being very good friends. This was a masterpiece indeed, and, as they say almost frightened Satan out of his wits; but he, being a ready manager, and particularly famous for serving himself of the roguries of the priests, faced about immediately to the mission, and making a virtue of necessity, clapt in, with all possible alacrity, with the proposal; so the Jesuits and he formed a hotch potch of religion, made up of popery and Paganism, and calculated to leave the latter rather worse then they found it, blending the faith of Christ and the philosophy or morals of Confucius together and formally christening them by the name of religion; by which means the politic interest of the mission was preserved; and yet Satan lost not one inch of ground with the Chinese no, not by the planting of the gospel itself, such as it was among them . . . . Thus the Jesuit mission has in itself been truly devilish, and the Devil has interested himself in the planting the Christian religion in China" (14-17).

Defoe treats the inquisition as an apostate appendage of an apostate church.
"Now, authors are much divided as to the manner how the Devil manages his proper instruments for mischief; for Satan has a great many agents in the dark, who neither have the Devil in them, nor are they much acquainted with him, and yet he serves himself of them; whether of their folly, or of that other frailty called wit, it is all one; he makes them do his work, when they think they are doing their own; nay so cunning is he in his guiding the weak part of the world, that even when they think they are serving God, they are doing nothing less or more than serving the Devil: nay, it is some of the nicest part of his operation, to make them believe they are serving God when they are doing his work. Thus those, who the Scripture foretold should persecute Christ's church in the latter days, where [sic] to think they do God good service. Thus the inquisition, (for example,) it may be, at this time, in all the acts of Christian cruelty which they are so famous for, (if any of them are ignorant enough not to know that they are devils incarnate,) may, for aught we know, go on for God's sake; torture, murder, starve to death, mangle, and macerate, and all for God and God's catholic church; and it is certainly the Devil's master-piece to bring mankind to such a perfection of devilism as that of the Inquisition is; for if the Devil had not been in them, could they chris[tan [sic] such a hell fire judicature as the inquisition is by the name of Holy Office?" (202-203).

Excerpt (pages):
The author's description of Jewish persecution in Spain and Portugal in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries includes various pejorative references to Catholicism. "Emanuel [the king of Portugal] . . . appeared at first to have some pity on them [Iberian Jews], but it was of short duration; the king [Emanuel of Portugal] having conceived a fondness for the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, the queen [Isabella of Spain] declared that she would not acknowledge a son-in-law who permitted the enemies of God to remain in his dominions, and, though, not greater enemies to God than she and her husband were, he [Emanuel of Portugal] for the sake of the daughter, issued an edict which expelled the Jews from Portugal, and appointed a day on which those who remained should be deprived of their liberty.

"When the appointed time arrived, the king very much disliked the idea of banishing such multitudes of people, and resolved to effect their conversion if possible, their children at least. He had engaged that ships should be provided for their embarkation, at three different ports, but afterwards he issued a proclamation, forbidding them to embark any where but at Lisbon.--When they arrived in this city, he ordered all the children, under fourteen years of age, to be forcibly taken from their parents, in order to be educated in their, worse if possible than anti-christian faith . . ." Author: Lindley Murray Title of Book: Introduction to the English Reader; or, a Selection of Pieces, in Prose and Poetry
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Philadelphia
Publisher: Joseph M'Dowell
Date of Publication: [1820]
Library Location: HBLL PE1120 M98 I6x 1820 (stacks)
Nature of Source: Originally published by Lindley Murray in 1795, this work was one of the standard textbooks for teaching nineteenth-century children to read. It consists of short selections of poetry and prose. Murray also published a number of related works, including an English Grammar (1795) and an English Spelling Book (1804).
Comment: This work demonstrates the nineteenth-century preoccupation with teaching children out of books that are virtuous and good. However, it contains only one reference that relates in any form to the restoration.
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages):
This passage partially relates to eternal marriage inasmuch as it posits that mortal relationships are eternal.
"When our parents and friends die, and are laid in the cold ground, we see them no more; but there [heaven] we shall embrace them again, and live with them, and be separated no more. There we shall meet all good men, whom we read of in holy books. There we shall see Abraham, the called of God, the father of the faithful; and Moses, after his long wanderings in the Arabian desert; and Elijah, the prophet of God; and Daniel, who escaped the lions' den; and there the son of Jesse, the shepherd king, the sweet singer of Israel. They loved God on earth; they praised him on earth; but in that country they will praise him better, and love him more" (66-67).

Arguing that baptism by immersion was practiced in the primitive church, Hinton alludes to recent mistakes in missionary translations of the Bible.

"The fact that almost every version of the Bible, ancient and modern, existing previous to 1820, has invariably, either not translated the word [baptizo] at all, or else rendered it by a term equivalent to dip, is interesting and worthy of attention . . . . With the exception of the Slavonic [sic] and Russian rendering krestit, and the Latin and English transfer of baptizo, instead of translation, all the versions existing have translated the word baptizo by dip, until within a few years. Paedobaptists, in order to be impartial, have now rendered the word in the Seneca language to sprinkle (the first time the word was ever so used); in the Chinese, 'to use the wetting ceremony;' and, by way of producing literary equilibrium with the Seneca translation, they have rendered it in the Cherokee immerse!

Leaving modern missionary versions out of the question, there is not a solitary version, in either the Eastern or Western languages, which in the slightest degree favors any other meaning of the term baptizo than that of immerse" (45-47).

"When the writer was a child, having been taught that the Bible was all true, and deeming the pictures in the Bible by no means an unimportant part of the book, he for some time was firm in this same faith [that baptism in the primitive church was done by sprinkling], for such was the pictorial representation of John baptizing Jesus: and, without breach of candor, it may be apprehended that such pictures still are a source of authority to many youthful minds in favor of the practice alluded to" (47).

Written as a "help to wavering Christians," this work stages a trial of the apostles to argue that Christ was, in fact, resurrected three days after his death. Little is available at BYU on the author John Hewson (who wrote this book under the pseudonym "Onesimus"). He is not listed in the American Biographical Archive, though a list of some of his publications can be found in L.H. Wright's American Fiction, 1774-1850 (San Marino: Huntington Library, 1969). Hewson's publications include an apparently semi-autobiographical work entitled The Doctrine of the New Birth, Exemplified in the Life and Religious Experience of Onesimus (Philadelphia: William F. Rackliff, 1839), but unfortunately this publication is not available at BYU. It seems likely that Hewson was Baptist by affiliation (at least in 1835). (Worldcat indicates that he was the author of An Oration, pronounced on the twenty-fifth of December, 1835, on the character, nature and attributes of Jesus Christ in the Second Baptist Meeting House, of Philadelphia [Philadelphia: S.W. Neall, 1836]).

Comment: Donated by a "Miss Hess," this work was included in the Nauvoo Library. It contains references that relate to visions, the scattering of Israel, and the divinity of the United States, etc. An especially interesting aspect of the narrative is the author's use of a pseudonym when recording a vision. This leads to the following question: Who is supposed to be the work's author? God, Onesimus, or Hewson? In fact, the narrative is layered, purporting to be voiced by Onesimus (as inspired by God) with Hewson acting merely as a stenographer (who occasionally intrudes into the narrative in parenthesis). This is evident throughout the entire text, but the illustration below is especially relevant since it includes all three narrative layers in a single paragraph. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entry.)

Researcher: Erik L. Myrup

Excerpt (pages):
"So that the plan of the work was from Heaven: but the language in which the vision is clothed is the author's own, as a free agent, in the collocation of his words. So that, with Solomon he sought to find out the best words in his vernacular tongue to clothe his ideas. And it came to pass in the process of time, by the overruling providence of God, that Captain Onesimus arrived in one of his master's ships of the line, in this spiritual warfare, at the port of Philadelphia, when he went on shore, and undertook a pedestrious voyage . . . and soon arrived at an old edifice, called Congress Hall . . . . (The reader will benignly indulge the stenographer, to inform him, that it was in this hall, that the first germ (in the full sense of the word,) of the inalienable rights of mankind were planted . . .)" (6-7).

Nature of Source: Published in 1843, Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico is one of the great historical narrative of the nineteenth century. Drawing extensively upon early Spanish accounts, Prescott documents the rise and fall of Aztec civilization.
Comment: Prescott's description of ancient Mexico includes allusions to a number of relevant subjects regarding ancient civilizations, sectarian strife, the modern recapitulation of biblical events, pre-Columbian migrations to the Americas, etc. (Where appropriate, distinct subjects have been given their own archival entries.)
Researcher: Erik L. Myrup
Excerpt (pages): Prescott includes an extract from Sahagun's "Historia de Nueva España," containing the advice of an Aztec mother to her daughter. The portion quoted below bears a partial resemblance to the path leading to the tree of life in the Book of Mormon.

"My daughter, this is the course you are to take; since in this manner the ancestors from whom you spring brought us up. Those noble and venerable dames, your grandmothers, told us not so many things as I have told you,--they said but few words, and spoke thus: 'Listen, my daughters; in this world it is necessary to live with much prudence and circumspection. Hear this allegory, which I shall now tell you, and preserve it, and take from it a warning and example for living aright. Here, in this world, we travel by a very narrow steep, and dangerous road, which is as a lofty mountain ridge, on whose top passes a narrow path; on either side is a great gulf without bottom, and, if you deviate from the path, you will fall into it. There is need, therefore, of much discretion in pursuing the road.' My tenderly loved daughter, my little dove, keep this illustration in your heart, and see that you do not forget it,--it will be to you as a lamp and a beacon, so long as you shall live in this world" (vol. 3, 423).

The author begins and ends the work with the assertion that it was inspired by a vision. "The original idea of this work is from Heaven, and first presented itself to the author's mind, while he was standing in the old Congress Hall, viewing West's picture of Christ Rejected; when there came a portion of the divine afflatus from heaven, and presented the plan of the following work to the author's view, and immediately passed away. The whole time he was viewing the Picture did not exceed half an hour: nevertheless, it returned to him at different times through the same year; and when he had light on the subject, he wrote it down. So that the plan of the work was from Heaven: but the language in which the vision is clothed is the author's own, as a free agent, in the collocation of his words. So that, with Solomon, he sought to find out the best words in his vernacular tongue to clothe his ideas" (5-6).

"The writer having communicated what God hath shown him, in a vision, concerning the unbelief of his ancient people, the children of Israel. The author first saw these things in a vision, in the month of April, 1830; when the Spirit of the Lord, as he was viewing West's picture of Christ rejected, for about half an hour. During which short time the Lord gave him the plan of the trial of the disciples, charged by the nation of the Jews, with stealing the crucified body of Christ out of the sepulchre. Which work I commend

Nature of Source: A short poetic book on the virtues of Womanhood and how they must be protected and developed. The book is divided into short sections, which are designed to help woman appreciate and understand their roles in life.
Comment: Published in 1817, this small volume is helpful in understanding the role of woman (as viewed by some) in Joseph Smith's time.

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Dover, NH
Publisher: Free-Will Baptist Printing Establishment
Date of Publication: 1846
Library Location: HBLL BX 6379 .M3 A3
Nature of Source: An antebellum America memoir of a late Christian minister edited by a family member, perhaps his wife. The entire book is a detailed, first person account of his awakening to Christianity as a young boy and his subsequent life as a minister of the gospel.
Comment: Very useful to scholars of early Mormon history because Marks (a contemporary of Joseph Smith) describes in great detail the social and religious climate surrounding the restoration in New England. He too was troubled by the religious excitement and found God through prayer. He also met with the Mormons and recorded his observations.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages):

"Next day we attended a meeting in Fayette, and tarried at the house of Mr. Whitmer. Here we saw two or three of his sons, and others to the number of eight, who said they were witnesses of a certain book just published, call the 'Golden Bible,' or 'Book of Mormon.' They affirmed, that an angel had showed them certain plates of metal, having the appearance of gold, that were dug out of the ground by one Joseph Smith; that on these plates was written a history of the ten tribes of Israel which were lost, and revelations to different prophets that arose among them." (237)
Marks went on and discussed his feelings about the Book of Mormon after he read 200 pages. "From all the circumstances, I thought it probably had been written originally by an infidel, to see how much he could impose on the credulity of men, and to get money. Yet, I expected they would make converts; for there are many people who are fond of new things; and there is scarcely any system so absurd as to obtain no advocates." (237)

Title of Book: A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: The American Tract Society

Date of Publication: 183-?
Library Location: BYU HBLL BR 120 .W3 Nature of Source: Likely published in the 1830s, Wilberforce's book is an attempt to show the divergence between the Christianity of "professed Christians in the higher and middle classes" in comparison with that of "real Christianity." As expected, his writing is often condemnatory towards what he perceives to be a false Christianity. Writing with "deep concern" over the condition of Christianity, Wilberforce divides his critique into several sections: inadequate conceptions of the importance of Christianity, corruption of human nature, chief defects of the religious system of the bulk of professed Christians, prevailing inadequate conceptions concerning the nature and strictness of practical Christianity, and the excellence of Christianity in certain important particulars.

Comment: Wilberforce's writings may be of interest to Mormon historians because he details many of the elements of protestant Christianity that Joseph Smith may have also questioned and attempted to reform. Wilberforce and Smith were contemporaries on opposite sides of the Atlantic but faced the same challenges as religious reformers.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages): Wilberforce was very concerned with the increasing wealth of middle class and upper class England. In his mind, wealth did not bring individuals to Christ, rather it kept their attentions occupied with worldly pursuits and pleasures. He looked around and found himself in the midst of apostasy. "In times like these, therefore, the strict precepts and self-denying habits of Christianity naturally slide into disuse; and, even among the better sort of Christians, are likely to be softened, so far at least as to be rendered less abhorrent from the general disposition to relaxation and indulgence. In such prosperous circumstances, men, in truth, are apt to think very little about religion. Christianity, therefore, seldom occupying the attention of the bulk of nominal Christians, and being scarcely at all the object of their study, we should expect, of course, to find them extremely unacquainted with its tenets." Nature of Source: A narrative history detailing the early life and subsequent prophetic mission of Jemima Wilkinson, who claimed to have been resurrected as the Lord Jesus Christ. Written by an obvious non-believer, her claims and history are challenged on every page. It appears to be written as a warning to others who might be deluded into following other "prophets" of New England.

Comment: The author provides a great deal of information about the religious climate in New England during the end of the Eighteenth Century and describes how a new religious movement based on charismatic gifts and claims of visions and communion with the divine can be perpetuated. Others have made connections between the ministries and claims of Jemima and Joseph Smith, not literally but figuratively.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages): At the age of 23, Jemima was deeply affected by the great awakening which raged in the spiritual community around her. Her biographer describes it thus: "About the year 1774 there sprang up in the country of Providence, a sect of religionists styling themselves 'New-lights,' called by some 'New-light Baptists,' and by others 'Separates,' they having separated from other denominations. The zeal of these fanatics exceeded that of all other professors of religion, and constituted, in their opinion, no doubt, their chief excellence." (15) As a result of these meetings and the religious fervor they stirred up, Jemima was troubled spiritually and physically. These ailments and the need for salvation eventually led to her "calling" and reincarnation as the resurrected Jesus Christ.

Author: William Paley

Title of Book: Natural Theology; or, Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of The Deity, Collected From the Appearances of Nature

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: London

Publisher: J. Faulder

Date of Publication: 1813

Library Location: BYU HBLL BL 181 .P3 1813

Nature of Source: This work is an attempt of William Paley, late Archdeacon of Carlisle, England, to prove the existence of a benevolent creator. He discusses the backgrounds of plants, animals, insects, human bodies, elements, astronomy, and ultimately how all of these things point to a Deity filled with goodness and concern for its creations. The book is divided into twenty-seven chapters, each containing a logical argument, which points to, the author's main thesis amply described in the beginning and ending of the book. This book seems to be like many others written during this period that try to link science and religion.

Comment: The most germane and interesting sections of the book for Mormon historians seems to be the later chapters dealing with astronomy and the nature and existence of God. The earlier chapters focus on non-human creations. It is clear that Joseph Smith was but one in a long line of religious and scientific philosophers who was trying to answer the deep questions regarding God and man's creation and existence.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Paley begins his chapter on astronomy, "My opinion of Astronomy has always been, that it is not the best medium through which to prove the agency of an intelligent Creator; but that, this being proved, it shows, beyond all other sciences, the magnificence of his operations." (378) He continues to discuss the limitations of men in understanding the cosmos--namely the lack of sufficient telescopes. Nevertheless, throughout the remainder of the chapter he seeks to show the power and majesty of our Creator by detailing how what can be seen by men of his time points to a Creator who is orderly and purposeful in his creation. A very interesting take on cosmology at the turn of the nineteenth century.

Excerpt (pages): Wilberforce is particularly concerned that many professed Christians relied upon the atonement of Christ to save them in their sins, not from them. This would become a major theme in the Book of Mormon and in Joseph's teachings. "Doubtless there have been too many who, to their eternal ruin, have abused the doctrine of salvation by grace; and have vainly trusted in Christ for pardon and acceptance, when by their vicious lives they have plainly proved the groundlessness of their pretensions. The tree is to be known by its fruits; and there is too much reason to fear that there is no principal of faith, when it does not decidedly evince itself by the fruits of holiness." (98)

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston

Date of Publication: 1836
Library Location: HBLL BX 9969 .W7 R48
Nature of Source: A history of Rev. Winchester based on his surviving correspondence, sermons, and other personal records. Details much of his theology as a major Universalist thinker and preacher. He seems to have written on a number of themes of which similarities may be found in the Book of Mormon. Much of his writing centered around doctrines of the "restoration" which he uses to describe the restoration of salvation to many more members of mankind than traditional Christianity affords.
Comment: Much of the language regarding salvation and punishment seem to be similar to Joseph Smith in a broad sense and at times very close. I find it interesting how the terms restoration, restitution, and endless are defined and debated. It seems that Winchester and Smith shared some of the same major theological questions.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Rather than referring to the "restoration" or "restitution of all things" in the Mormon sense of bringing back original organizational church structures or doctrines, Winchester preaches these concepts as tenets of salvation which have been lost in the past and need to be revived to combat the idea Calvinistic idea of limited salvation for mankind. For example, "But our belief respecting the restoration of all things, is not only founded upon the plainest letter of scripture, but is exactly according to the experience of every Christian. . . . Did you not view the love of God infinitely full, free, unmerited and unreserved?" (61) He goes on to discuss the idea of universal salvation.
He also discusses the idea of "endless" when referring to the judgments and punishments of God, with very similar language and logic as Joseph Smith in D&C 19. It seems that both men were convinced that a loving God would not abandon his children to an endless hell but rather it was a type of punishment. "It is so evident that the word which is translated everlasting, cannot in the nature of things, absolutely signify without end..." (121).

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: J. Emory and B. Waugh
Date of Publication: 1829
Library Location: HBLL BX 9947 .M553
Nature of Source: A compilation of three lectures and five answers presented by Rev. Merritt in his attempt to discredit the doctrines of Universalism. The lectures are logically organized and each deal with a specific tenet of Universalism that Merritt believes to be wrong. He relies heavily upon scriptures and traditional Protestant interpretations of atonement and salvation. At times, he uses a dialogue style of questions and answers in his text to prove his points. His viewpoints are further buttressed by the addition of two other discourses by the Rev. Wilbur Fisk.
Comment: The author presents a well-reasoned defense of traditional Protestantism in the face of increasing pressure from Universalists in New England. While he does not discuss Mormonism (1829) or any tenants that would later become uniquely Mormon, he does provide the reader with insights into the religious climate and intellectual frameworks which may well have been representative on the eve of the Restoration. Eventually, Joseph Smith, through revelation, will put his own twist on many of these same doctrines.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Merritt begins his discussion by stating the danger in believing the claims of Universalism. He is very adamant about salvation coming through the channels as described in the Bible. "Were Universalism an error of moderate size,--did it affect the minor points only of our holy religion, charity, and humility would enjoin forbearance and Christian fellowship. But I take this modern doctrine to be another gospel; and, when considered as a system, to be totally unevangelical. It lays another foundation than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ our Redeemer and atoning High Priest, by teaching that sinners are saved (and we are all sinners) not by the merits of Christ, but by suffering in our own persons, and in this life, the whole penalty of the divine law: thus excluding the grace of God from having any proper efficiency, either in forgiving our sins, or in renewing our souls after the image of God." (11)

Length of Relevant Material: 3 pp.
Hard Copy:
The tract begins with a series of letters between Townsend and the elders of her church in which she describes her "heretical" belief. "These, and many other declarations, I think, go far to show, that the atonement will prove efficacious to all for whom it was intended; and that the purpose for which the Saviour came, will be accomplished. He says, 'I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.' -- That he came to 'seek and to save that which was lost;' and that he finished the work his Father gave him to do" (5)

"I cannot, dare not, limit the mercy of God; for it is written, I will not contend for ever, lest the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made, &c. Where sin abounds grace did much more abound."

Obviously unrepentant and firm in her conviction that God's punishment of the wicked is not everlasting she was eventually excommunicated from her church, the Brick Presbyterian Church.

Nature of Source: Watson proclaims his dictionary to be "explanatory of the history, manners, and customs of the Jews and neighboring nations with an account of the most remarkable places and persons mentioned in sacred scripture; an exposition of the principal doctrines of Christianity; and notices of Jewish and Christian sects and heresies." Like many other theological dictionaries produced then and now, Watson divides his writing into short encyclopedic entries on specific topics.

Comment: This work is important to Mormon scholars as this volume (an earlier edition) was found donated to the Nauvoo Library before the death of Joseph Smith. Therefore, Smith and the Saints would have had access to and may have been influenced by Watson's definitions and research. Of particular note is his writings and thoughts on the Hamitic myth and Egyptian history.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Watson's entry for Egypt reads: "A country of Africa, called also, in the Hebrew Scriptures the land of Mizraim, and the land of Ham; by the Turks and Arabs, Masr and Misr; and by the native Egyptians, Chemi, or the land of Ham. . . . Egypt was first peopled after the deluge by Mizraim, of Mizr, the son of Ham, who is supposed to be the same with Menes, recorded in Egyptian history as the first king." (331) This entry is very interesting in light of Joseph Smith's translation of the book of Abraham and how it corresponds with prevailing historical thought.

In time she was adopted by the tribe and then decided to continue to remain with them and their Indian ways for the remainder of her life. Her story describes not only her own life but also the lives, customs, and attitudes of the Indians she lives with and describes frontier conditions in frontier America, particularly upstate New York between the 1750s and 1820s.

Comment: A very interesting story of an older woman recounting her story about Indian life and how she became part of Native America. Very interesting details on all aspects of Indian life including their religious beliefs and oral traditions.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Grudner claims that Jemison's story has parallels to the Hill Cumorah. "The great hill at the head of Canadaigua lake, from whence they sprung, is called Genundewah, and has for a long time past been the place where the Indians of that nation have met in council, to hold great talks, and to offer up prayers to the Great Spirit, on account of its having been their birth place; and also in consequence of the destruction of a serpent at that place, in ancient time, in a most miraculous manner, which threatened the destruction of the whole of the Senecas, and barely spared enough to commence replenishing the earth." In time she was adopted by the tribe and then decided to continue to remain with them and their Indian ways for the remainder of her life. Her story describes not only her own life but also the lives, customs, and attitudes of the Indians she lives with and describes frontier conditions in frontier America, particularly upstate New York between the 1750s and 1820s.
Comment: A very interesting story of an older woman recounting her story about Indian life and how she became part of Native America. Very interesting details on all aspects of Indian life including their religious beliefs and oral traditions.

Excerpt (pages): Grudner claims that Jemison's story has parallels to Abinadi's martyrdom and Lehi's dream. "I was able to find some evidence of his claims and other parallels as noted below:

    Abinadi: "The Col. Was then bound, stripped naked and tied by his wrists to the arm, which extended horizontally from the post, in such a manner that his arms were extended over his head, with his feet just standing upon the ground. This being done, the savages place the wood in a circle around him at the distance of a few feet, in order that his misery might be protracted to the greatest length, and then kindled it in a number of places at the same time. The flames arose..." (122)

    Lehi: "Although John had taken the life of his two brothers, and caused me unspeakable trouble and grief, his death made a solemn impression upon my mind, and seemed, in addition to my former misfortunes, enough to bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave." Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Geneva, NY

Publisher: S. P. Hull

Date of Publication: 1821

Library Location: HBLL AMER/RARE BR 1719 .W5 H8

Nature of Source: A narrative history detailing the early life and subsequent prophetic mission of Jemima Wilkinson, who claimed to have been resurrected as the Lord Jesus Christ. Written by an obvious non-believer, her claims and history are challenged on every page. It appears to be written as a warning to others who might be deluded into following other "prophets" of New England.

Comment: The author provides a great deal of information about the religious climate in New England during the end of the Eighteenth Century and describes how a new religious movement based on charismatic gifts and claims of visions and communion with the divine can be perpetuated. Others have made connections between the ministries and claims of Jemima and Joseph Smith, not literally but figuratively.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): In time, Jemima was able to gather a number of followers who believed her to be Jesus Christ. Eventually, she began asking them to financially support her and her ambitions. One such method was by issuing "common stock" in return for donations by her followers. "After some altercation, they agreed to have the society so organized as that the property of all should be put back into a general fund, and held as common stock for the benefit of the whole; and that he should be appointed overseer and manager of the temporal, while she should devote herself wholly to the spiritual, concerns of the society." (32) "Whenever she wanted anything which she saw in possession of any of her followers, she would send for them and say, 'the Lord hath need of this thing,'" (32-33) According to the author, this demand was made frequently and generally with great success.

Nature of Source: An antebellum America memoir of a late Christian minister edited by a family member, perhaps his wife. The entire book is a detailed, first person account of his awakening to Christianity as a young boy and his subsequent life as a minister of the gospel.
Comment: Very useful to scholars of early Mormon history because Marks (a contemporary of Joseph Smith) describes in great detail the social and religious climate surrounding the restoration in New England. He too was troubled by the religious excitement and found God through prayer. He also met with the Mormons and recorded his observations.

Excerpt (pages):

After becoming a Free-will Baptist, he sought the will of the Lord concerning his life and future labors. He had an experience which was similar to Joseph Smith’s calling to preach the gospel. Lacking is a distinct vision but there are some interesting parallels. "During this period, one day when the rain and snow were descending on the earth, while at the house of Elder Dean, I felt the first direct impulse as if from Heaven, 'Go thou and preach the gospel.' Every surrounding object now assumed a mournful aspect; and retiring immediately to a wood on the shore of Seneca lake, half a mile from any house, I cast myself upon the beach, where the restless waves uttered a hoarse murmur on one side, and the bleak winds rustled in the forest on the other. Raising a tearful eye to Heaven, 'I exclaimed, 'O my God, is this truly from thee? and must I, an ignorant child, go and preach thy gospel?' After weeping awhile upon the ground, I arose and queried thus with myself; 'Can it be, that God will pass by the learned, the wise, the experienced, and choose a child of fifteen years to preach the gospel?" Nature of Source: Watson proclaims his dictionary to be "explanatory of the history, manners, and customs of the Jews and neighboring nations with an account of the most remarkable places and persons mentioned in sacred scripture; an exposition of the principal doctrines of Christianity; and notices of Jewish and Christian sects and heresies." Like many other theological dictionaries produced then and now, Watson divides his writing into short encyclopedic entries on specific topics.
Comment: This work is important to Mormon scholars as this volume (an earlier edition) was found donated to the Nauvoo Library before the death of Joseph Smith. Excerpt (pages): Under the entry "Canaan," we learn that "The Hebrews believe that Canaan, having first discovered Noah's nakedness, told his father Ham; and that Noah, when he awoke, having understood what had passed, cursed Canaan, the first author of the offense. Others are of the opinion that Ham was punished in his son Canaan, Gen ix 25. For though Canaan is mentioned, Ham is not except from the malediction; on the contrary, he suffers more from it since parents are more affected with their children's misfortunes than with their own." Watson further discusses the prevailing view that Ham's seed settled in Africa. "It is true that many Africans, descendants of other branches of Ham's family, have been largely and cruelly enslaved, but so have other tribes in different parts of the world. There is certainly no proof that the Negro race were ever placed under this malediction. Had they been included in it, this would neither have justified their oppressors, nor proved that Christianity is not designed to remove the curse of slavery." (207)

Title of Book: The Works of Flavius Josephus

Date of Publication: 1829
Library Location: BYU HBLL DS 116 .J7
Nature of Source: Flavius Josephus was a Jewish-Roman historian living at the time of Christ. He chronicled much of the history of the Roman Empire including the rise of Christianity and many other topics relevant to modern day scholars of both Judaism and Christianity. His "Works" are his most important collection of historical writings and were quoted widely during Joseph's time.

Comment: This work is important to Mormon scholars as this volume was found to be in both the Manchester and Nauvoo Library before the death of Joseph Smith. Therefore, Smith and the Saints would have had access to and may have been influenced by Watson's definitions and research. Of particular note to Joseph's translation of the book of Abraham are his writings and thoughts on the Hamitic myth and Egyptian history.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages):

Joseph was very interested in the lineage of Ham because of the priesthood passages in the book of Abraham that dealt with Egyptus and the settlement of Egypt. Joseph subscribed to the traditional Hamitic myth as found in Genesis 9. "Noah, when, after the Deluge, the earth was re-settled in its former condition, set about its cultivation; and when he had planted it with vines, and when the fruit was ripe, and he had gathered the grapes in their season, and the wine was ready for use, he offered sacrifice, and feasted, and, being drunk, he fell asleep, and lay naked in an unseemly manner. When his youngest son saw this, he came laughing, and showed him to his brethren; but they covered their father's nakedness. And when Noah was made sensible of what had been done, he prayed for prosperity to his other sons; but for Ham, he did not curse him, by reason of his nearness in blood, but cursed his posterity. And when the rest of them escaped that curse, God inflicted it on the children of Canaan." (37)

Nature of Source: A short history of the Waldenses Christian movement in the European Alps. The narrative tells the story of one Pierre and his family's life and experiences as Waldenses. Details some of the persecution of this trouble sect and how they have managed to remain independent from other Christian groups by taking refuge in the mountains.
Comment: This history offers strong precedence for the idea of abandoning mainstream civilization and finding sanctuary in the tops of the mountains where people can be free to worship as they please. While I cannot recall Joseph Smith ever referring specifically to the Waldenses and their plight later Mormons used them as the model for the hymn, "For the Strength of the Hills." Joseph Smith did however prophecy that the saints would be driven to the tops of the Rocky Mountains where they would finally find peace as did the Waldenses.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages): In the introduction, the reader is given a flavor for the tone of the story of Pierre and his family. "Behold, then, in these valleys, the retreats of a most interesting people, who, in times of misrule and oppression in the State, and of bigotry and superstition in the Church, preserved, in simplicity and purity, the 'faith once delivered to the saints.' Men that continued, from race to race, a separate people,--like the Hebrew fathers of old, who went from one nation to another, and from one kingdom to another people,--so the Christians of those early ages, 'hunted as partridges on the mountains,' and stigmatized as heretics by their enemies,--when persecuted in 'one city, fled unto another,' and, when dislodged from the shelter of one lovely valley, retreated to the sequestered bosom of some other." Nature of Source: As the title states, this is a narrative overview of the United Brethren's efforts to proselyte two tribes of Indians in mid to late 1700s. As with most mission histories, it extols the virtues of the mission and the missionaries and describes how they were able to bring Christianity to the ignorant Indians in the region.

Comment: It describes similar feelings for the Native Americans as Joseph Smith would feel years later. Both the United Brethren would take it upon themselves to share their brand of the gospel and help the Indians overcome their traditions. One major difference is that Joseph Smith and the Mormons saw the Native Americans as the descendants of Lehi who had been promised the gospel millennia before.

Excerpt (pages): In the only section that I was able to find that linked the new world Indians to the peoples of the old world, it is interesting that the illusion is made comparing or perhaps even naming the Indians "Canaanites." "Such accounts were eagerly caught at by fanatics, to serve the doctrine they heretofore had held, viz: that the Indians were the Canaanites, who by God's commandment were to be destroyed; and that this not having been done by them at that time, the present war might be considered as a just punishment from God for their disobedience." Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:

Date of Publication: 1837
Library Location: HBLL RARE BT 201 .M5
Nature of Source: A typical doctrinal treatise by a minister of one church debating the truthfulness of another church. In this case, the author is arguing that the Trinitarian doctrine of the trinity (three separate beings) is totally false as proven by the scriptures. The author proceeds logically and bolsters his claims based on Bible references and the writings of the early Christian fathers. At time he even references learned Jewish scholars on the early Jewish concepts of a Godhead.
Comment: Interesting in that it describes with great detail one of the major doctrinal sticking points in Protestant theology during the life of Joseph Smith. Many, including Joseph, were asking What is the nature of God and the Godhead? The Bible was used by both sides to prove their points. Although not directly related to Mormonism, it does help the reader gain a better understanding of contemporary Christianity.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): In contrast with Joseph Smith's explanation of the word Elohim, Millard writes: "The Hebrew name Elohim, is often appealed to as proof that God is a plurality of persons. The argument used is, that this name must necessarily be of plural comprehension. This every learned Jew denies, and says it is a mere idiom of their language." (12) Another representative passage continues this debate: "With this view of the above passages, I can find nothing in the scriptures, to teach me that God is three persons. If the writers of the Bible, particularly the New Testament, meant to have us believe that God is three persons, instead of one, might we not reasonably suppose, they would have recorded the doctrine in the most plain and unequivocal terms?" Title of Book: Biography of Rev. Elhanan Winchester
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: H. B. Brewster
Date of Publication: 1836
Library Location: HBLL BX 9969 .W7 R48
Nature of Source: A history of Rev. Winchester based on his surviving correspondence, sermons, and other personal records. Details much of his theology as a major Universalist thinker and preacher. He seems to have written on a number of themes of which similarities may be found in the Book of Mormon. Much of his writing centered around doctrines of the "restoration" which he uses to describe the restoration of salvation to many more members of mankind than traditional Christianity affords.
Comment: Much of the language regarding salvation and punishment seem to be similar to Joseph Smith in a broad sense and at times very close. I find it interesting how the terms restoration, restitution, and endless are defined and debated. It seems that Winchester and Smith shared some of the same major theological questions.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Regarding infant baptism and the prevailing Christian ideas of limited salvation--without baptism, damnation--Wincester said the following about those who died without baptism: "Now if there be no change after death, they must be forever miserable as the consequence of an ignorance they possessed no power to obviate. With what character does this clothe the Deity! It represents that benevolent Being who is good to all, even to the wayward and thankless . . . One of his [Calvin's] followers has attempted to reconcile this Molochean doctrine with the divine equity and goodness, by teaching that as infants are not actual transgressors, God will assign them to a milder form of punishment! How different the views of the Savior." (149-150).
He then goes on to discuss the idea of Christ, following his death, going to the spirit world and preaching to the people who had never heard the gospel before so that they too can be saved. He uses the scripture 1 Peter 3:18-20, like Joseph will years later to discuss the idea of a continuing salvation and the fact that the plan of salvation is not completed for all during this earthly life. While similar to Smith's later teachings, Winchester argues that although Christ will visit the spirits in the spirit world who have not heard his gospel, no further gospel ordinances will be necessary...or at least he does not mention any type of baptism for the dead as Smith would later teach.

Nature of Source: A very typical publication of the laws of a particular state. They were laws that were passed during the first session of the twelfth general assembly of the representatives of the state of Missouri. The book is divided into topical sections with the pertinent laws listed in order.
Comment: Of interest to Mormon researchers are the several sections of legislation regarding compensation for those employed "for services in the Mormon disturbances." This is in reference to the state of Missouri mobilizing to exterminate the Mormons from its borders, which resulted in the Saints moving to Illinois.

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: J. Emory and B. Waugh
Date of Publication: 1829
Library Location: HBLL BX 9947 .M553
Nature of Source: A compilation of three lectures and five answers presented by Rev. Merritt in his attempt to discredit the doctrines of Universalism. The lectures are logically organized and each deal with a specific tenet of Universalism that Merritt believes to be wrong. He relies heavily upon scriptures and traditional Protestant interpretations of atonement and salvation. At times, he uses a dialogue style of questions and answers in his text to prove his points. His viewpoints are further buttressed by the addition of two other discourses by the Rev. Wilbur Fisk.

Comment: The author presents a well-reasoned defense of traditional Protestantism in the face of increasing pressure from Universalists in New England. While he does not discuss Mormonism (1829) or any tenants that would later become uniquely Mormon, he does provide the reader with insights into the religious climate and intellectual frameworks which may well have been representative on the eve of the Restoration. Eventually, Joseph Smith, through revelation, will put his own twist on many of these same doctrines.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages): One of Merritt's biggest problems with Universalists was their claim that their would be no future judgment as he conceived it would be. Therefore, he devoted much of his essays to dispute this notion and reaffirm the reality of the pending judgment. "There will be a judgment of all mankind; for which a particular time is assigned at the end of the world. My hearers! We have come to a subject which is infinitely interesting to us all! The question before us relates to our standing before the judgment seat of Christ, where the secrets of all hearts shall be laid open to the inspection of men and of angels, and where we shall receive, a the hand of the Judge, according to that we have done, whether it be good or bad." Nature of Source: A large volume dealing with the Christian mission of the United Brethren to the Indians of New England. Written with missionary zeal and keen observations, this book details the conditions of Native Americans in the late 17th century. It is a typical mission history in that it explains the presumed origins of the local Native Americans, describes their lifestyle and belief systems, and then highlights the Christian response to their heathen condition and their reactions to the offered gospel.

Comment: Within this Indian and mission history are several sections on Indian beliefs, some of which are similar to Mormonism. This book may, however, be of more interest to students of Native American history.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages):

In discussing the Indians belief system, the author explains that the offering of sacrifices is also part of their society and religion. He makes it clear however that there is no temple worship and that sacrifice is done on a more personal and occasional basis than other religions.

"Sacrifices made with a view to pacify God and the subordinate deities are also among the religious ceremonies of the Indians. These sacrifices are of very ancient date, and considered in so sacred a light, that unless they are performed in proper time and in a manner acceptable to the Deity, they suppose illness, misfortunes, and death itself, would certainly befall them and their families. But they have neither priests regularly appointed, nor temples. At general and solemn sacrifices, the oldest men perform the offices of priests, but in private parties, each man bringing a sacrifice is priest himself. Instead of a temple, a large dwelling-house is fitted up for the purpose." (39)

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Geneva, NY
Publisher: S. P. Hull
Date of Publication: 1821
Library Location: HBLL AMER/RARE BR 1719 .W5 H8
Nature of Source: A narrative history detailing the early life and subsequent prophetic mission of Jemima Wilkinson, who claimed to have been resurrected as the Lord Jesus Christ. Written by an obvious non-believer, Jemima's claims and history are challenged on every page. It appears to be written as a warning to others who might be deluded into following other "prophets" of New England.

Comment: The author provides a great deal of information about the religious climate in New England during the end of the Eighteenth Century and describes how a new religious movement based on charismatic gifts and claims of visions and communion with the divine can be perpetuated. Others have made connections between the ministries and claims of Jemima and Joseph Smith, not literally but figuratively.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Over time, she moved throughout part of New England to gather new sets of followers. At one point she decided to settle a new area of land with her followers and designated it Jerusalem. "Jemima gave that part of the country in which they settled, the name of Jerusalem, and lost no time in organizing her Society under the old discipline, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing her prospects begin to brighten." Nature of Source: It is Munger's autobiography written much later in his life to recount his conversion to Christianity and his subsequent missionary work and personal background. It was published when he was nearly eighty years old based on his memory as he states in the preface that he never did keep a journal.

Comment: Of use to Mormon scholars in that it describes revivalism and camp meetings in New England that show some similar feelings as Joseph Smith's own recollections of this transforming period in American religious history.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages):

"I heard of a camp-meeting in Connecticut, about twelve miles from there; and as I had never attended one, I concluded to go, and learning that the Methodists had put some into the preacher's stand for not obeying their rules, I proposed to a man of equal strength, named Goodale, to go with me, and see if the Methodists could put us into the preacher's stand." (15) He then goes on to discuss how some local rowdies came to the camp revival and tried to destroy the camp and scatter the worshippers and how he and some men finally got the situation back under control.

The rest of his autobiography is a series of stories and experiences strung together to form the basis of his life story.

Author: William Paley
Title of Book: The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: London
Publisher: Baldwyn & Co.

Date of Publication: 1821 (first printed in 1785)
Library Location: BYU HBLL BJ 1005 .P2 1821
Nature of Source: In 1785, William Paley, Subdean of Lincoln, Prebendary of Saint Paul's, and Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth, wrote this treaties on moral and political philosophy in honor of the Right Revered Edmund Law, Lord Bishop of Carlisle. Through these writings, Paley was attempting to help his readers better understand the "simplicity of the Gospel" through a careful reading and interpretation of the "original records" i.e. the Holy Bible. He is primarily concerned with "morals." Paley divides his work in to six themed "books": preliminary considerations, moral obligations, relative duties, of relative duties which are indeterminate and the crimes opposite to these, of relative duties which result from the constitution of the sexes and the crimes opposed to these, duties to ourselves and the crimes opposite to these, duties towards God, elements of political knowledge.

Comment: Due to a detailed table of contents, Paley's work is easily searched and discovered. He deals with a number of moral topics and questions that would be later debated during the ministry of Joseph Smith. One thing to note is that Paley is writing in England and his views may differ from prevailing moral views in America due to culture and distance.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): Plural marriage would eventually play a major role in the restoration. Paley, like others of his day, condemned the practice of polygamy and attempted to demonstrate that God did not intend his children to live in such a "sinful" state.
"Polygamy not only violates the constitution of nature, and the apparent design of the Deity, but produces to the parties themselves, and to the public, the following bad effects: contests and jealousies among the wives of the same husband; distracted affections, or the loss of all affection in the husband himself; a voluptuousness in the rich which dissolves the vigour or their intellectual as well as active faculties, producing that indolence and imbecility both of mind and body, which have long characterized the nations of the East; the abasement of one half the human species, who, in countries where polygamy obtains, are degraded into mere instruments of physical pleasure to the other half; neglect of children; and the manifold, and sometimes unnatural mischiefs, which arise from a scarcity of women. To compensate for these evils, polygamy does not offer a single advantage." (199)

Excerpt (pages):

In discussing the Indians belief system, the author explains that polygamy or plural marriage is also part of their society and religion.

"But the walk and conduct of these teachers of morality altogether disagreed with their exhortations to lead a good and virtuous life. Among other vile practices, they publicly introduced polygamy, and during their sermons, had several of their wives fitting round about them. They even pretended that it was a charitable and meritorious act in them, as men living in intimacy with God, to take these poor ignorant woman, and lead them in the way to God and to the enjoyment of eternal felicity." (38)

This concluding argument parallels later LDS arguments that leaders are required by God to raise up a large, righteous posterity and help them enjoy "eternal life." The author's contempt for polygamy and its logic is similar to later protests against the Mormons practice of plural marriage.

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston

Date of Publication: 1826
Library Location: HBLL Rare E 178.3 .G66
Nature of Source: A simple narrative history of the United States written for school aged children to instill in them a feeling of patriotism and love for their heritage. Designed to be used by teachers or parents as evidenced by the questions for review in back and lesson type structure. The title page adds that it is "containing general views of the aborigines, of the progress of manners, religion, trade and commerce, agricultural, arts and manufactures, population and education" of the United States.
Comment: Published four years before the Book of Mormon, this book offers a simple description of Native American life before Columbus including a short section on their belief systems and society.
Researcher: Reid L. Neilson
Excerpt (pages): "The origin of the Indians, inhabiting the country, on the arrival of the English colonists, is involved in much obscurity, and several different answers have been given by learned men to the inquiry, whence did they come to America? The opinion best supported is, that they originated in Asia, and that at some former period, not now to be ascertained, they emigrated from that country to America, over which, in succeeding years, their descendants spread." The author then shares theories such as the frozen Alaskan Strait or canoes. (16)

It describes all of the "countries, kingdoms, nations and tribes of men" that make up the Bible text. It is arranged alphabetically by topic with some sub-topics imbedded in related entries.
Comment: Helps researchers understand what was known about the Bible and its geography before Joseph Smith began to bring for his own scripture by revelation. There are a few entries which may be of interest to Mormon scholars who deal with Lehi's departure from Jerusalem with his family.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages):

There is an entry for Nephi, the writer of the first book of the Book of Mormon. It reads "Nephi or Naphthar, the name of that place where Nehemiah found the muddy water, which was in the pit, where the holy fire had been hid, 2 Macc. i, 36. Copies vary concerning this word." (no page numbers)

There is also a lengthy entry for Arabia which provides much more information that I previously thought was available in Joseph Smith's early days regarding the land and peoples of the Arabian peninsula. The entry describes many of the land's inhabitants as dwelling in tents and traveling across the deserts until they would come across verdant oasis and other places of refuge. Gives a good overview of what nineteenth century life was like in Arabia. (no page numbers)

"That they consider the soul as immortal, and even suppose a resurrection of the body, may be inferred from their usual manner of expressing themselves, when they say, 'We Indians cannot die eternally; even Indian corn, buried in the ground, is vivified and rises again.' Many believe in the transmigration of the souls, and imagine that they were with God before their birth, and came from him, or that they have been formerly in the world, and are now living over again. They suppose, that when the souls have been sometime with God, they are at liberty to return into the world, and to be born again."
Obviously there are some similarities between the Mormon concept of preexistence and the Indian idea that we all lived with God before this life but the Indians seem to believe more in a reincarnation concept rather than eternal progression.

Vermont law was very clear on the need for legal and ecclesiastical authority for marriage performance. "That any person, no authorized and empowered to solemnize marriage, by this act, shall join any persons in marriage, and be thereof convicted, on indictment, before the supreme court of judicature; he shall pay a fine, at the discretion of the court, to the use of the county in which the offence shall be committed: the fine not to exceed three hundred dollars, nor be less than one hundred dollars." (265) The law then makes an interesting exception for the Quakers or Friends. "Provided nevertheless, and it is hereby further enacted, that nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the right of the people called Friends, or Quakers, to solemnize marriage, in the manner usually practiced in their meetings." As Merritt continues to argue that only believers can be saved, he takes objection with a Universalist who tries to prove that anyone can be saved through the grace of God by comparing unbelievers to infants who have not yet received the gospel. Merritt contends that this line of reasoning is false because infants have never had the choice to believe while others have had the opportunity to believe but have not. "But unbelief is the rejecting of Christ and the gospel; and therefore it is evident that those who never had the offer of Christ, cannot be unbelievers, seeing that they cannot reject him to whom he was never offered." Title of Book: A Discussion on Universal Salvation
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: J. Emory and B. Waugh
Date of Publication: 1829
Library Location: HBLL BX 9947 .M553
Nature of Source: A compilation of three lectures and five answers presented by Rev. Merritt in his attempt to discredit the doctrines of Universalism. The lectures are logically organized and each deal with a specific tenet of Universalism that Merritt believes to be wrong. He relies heavily upon scriptures and traditional Protestant interpretations of atonement and salvation. At times, he uses a dialogue style of questions and answers in his text to prove his points. His viewpoints are further buttressed by the addition of two other discourses by the Rev. Wilbur Fisk.

Comment: The author presents a well-reasoned defense of traditional Protestantism in the face of increasing pressure from Universalists in New England. While he does not discuss Mormonism (1829) or any tenants that would later become uniquely Mormon, he does provide the reader with insights into the religious climate and intellectual frameworks which may well have been representative on the eve of the Restoration. Eventually, Joseph Smith, through revelation, will put his own twist on many of these same doctrines.

Researcher: Reid L. Neilson

Excerpt (pages): One of the big theological debates Joseph Smith would eventually discuss in the 19th section of the D&C is the idea of endless punishment. Just what did endless mean? Some accepted it literally while others felt it was a figurative punishment. Merritt took it very literally. "Whatever the terms be, in which the sentence upon the wicked is expressed, they must imply endless duration; not only because they are prospective, and look forward into eternity, without any rate of time to limit their significance; but because the administration of the mediatorial kingdom will then have ceased. There is then no longer a mediator between God and men.-- Mercy is no longer exercised towards the guilty." (23)

Merritt abhorred this notion and made it very clear that salvation was conditional. "That holiness (I speak of moral holiness) is required of man as the condition of his salvation, is reasonable from the consideration of the powers and faculties with which he is endued. He is an immortal, intelligent, moral, accountable creature. He is capable of knowing and loving the Author of his being. He is endued with the power of choice and liberty of will; and therefore he is capable, with the gracious succours afforded him, of performing the conditions of eternal salvation, and is justly accountable if he does not. Free agency has no place in the creed of a modern Universalist, and looks with a frowning aspect upon his whole system." (37)

Nature of Source: In 1785, William Paley, Subdean of Lincoln, Prebendary of Saint Paul's, and Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth, wrote this treaties on moral and political philosophy in honor of the Right Revered Edmund Law, Lord Bishop of Carlisle. Through these writings, Paley was attempting to help his readers better understand the "simplicity of the Gospel" through a careful reading and interpretation of the "original records" ie. the Holy Bible. He is primarily concerned with "morals." Paley divides his work in to six themed "books": preliminary considerations, moral obligations, relative duties, of relative duties which are indeterminate and the crimes opposite to these, of relative duties which result from the constitution of the sexes and the crimes opposed to these, duties to ourselves and the crimes opposite to these, duties towards God, elements of political knowledge.

Comment: Due to a detailed table of contents, Paley's work is easily searched and discovered. He deals with a number of moral topics and questions that would be later debated during the ministry of Joseph Smith. One thing to note is that Paley is writing in England and his views may differ from prevailing moral views in America due to culture and distance.
Nearly fifty years before the revelation on the Word of Wisdom was received by Joseph Smith, others in Europe and America were calling for an end to drunkenness. Of the evils of drunkenness, Paley writes; "The mischief of drunkenness, from which we are to compute the guilt of it, consists in the following bad effects:--1) It betrays most constitutions either into extravagancies of anger, or sins of lewdness. 2) It disqualifies men for the duties of their station, both by the temporary disorder of their faculties, and at length by a constant incapacity and stupefaction. 3) It is attended with expences, which can often be ill spared. 4) It is sure to occasion uneasiness to the family of the drunkard. 5) It shortens life." (239) Paley sees drunkenness as both a social and moral issue that needs to be combated.

The excerpts below are typical of Marsh's tone and logic.

"The worm of the still, says the Missouri gentleman, never touches the brute creation, but as if the most venomous of all beings, it seizes the noblest prey. It bites man. And where it once leaves its subtle poison, farewell to heath--farewell to long life." (6)

"Not satisfied with filing jails, and hospitals, and graveyards, it must people hell. Every moral and religious principle is dissipated before it." (7)

Nature of Source: This was an individual pamphlet published in Great Britain, yet later combined with 29 other similar writings in a compilation entitled Divine Revelations and Prophecies. Although the author of this work remains anonymous, it was clearly written by a supporter of John Ward, who later took upon himself the name Zion. The stated purpose of this pamphlet is to refute the argument of the Reverend T.P. Foley, one of the earliest and most loyal disciples of Joanna Southcott. Following the prophetess' death in 1814, many claimed to be Southcott's successor, yet Foley and various others, such as Jane Townley and William Sharp, who together comprised the "Old Guard," rejected them all. One of these claimants was Zion Ward, who declared he was the Shiloh whose coming Southcott had prophesied of. Most likely either he or his followers wrote this pamphlet.

Comment: This brief excerpt provides an unusual interpretation of the creation, especially in regards to the role of women. It appears that the author perceives Adam as representing both the man and the woman, and in the process minimizes the importance of females.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "Now Edom means earthly, bloody, or red; Adam signifies man, earthly, red or bloody: and take notice, the name Adam is designed to signify male and female in one; see Gen. i. 27, 'So God created man in his own image: in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them:' yet you see there was but one person visible, and that was the male, but the female was invisible." This volume is the first of a three volume collection of John Wroe's visions and revelations that were putatively communicated to him by the Spirit. Due to a relative lack of education, Wroe found it necessary to recruit scribes from among his disciples who could then record his revelations. He was one of the many successors of Joanna Southcott, a self-proclaimed prophetess in early nineteenth century England, and he founded the sect of Christian Israelites, whose stronghold concentrated in the English towns of Bradford and Ashton-under-Lyne. Wroe attempted to transform the latter into a New Jerusalem, although he was forced to leave in 1831 due to sexual misconduct. From then on, he continued to receive and publish revelations and sought disciples elsewhere in Great Britain, as well as in the United States and Australia.

Comment: This is a brief excerpt from a revelation Wroe claims to have received in Ashton on September 9, 1823, as recorded by Henry Lees. Unfortunately, no information in the immediate text other than what appears below concerns the subject of anointings. However, based on this short sentence, one may conclude that Wroe utilized anointings in his ministry.

Nature of Source: This is one of thirty pamphlets published individually between 1829 and 1831 in England, yet later compiled into one book. This particular work was written by Jane Lead, a mystic who claimed to have received personal revelation and prophecy in the 1600s. It appears that her writings later influenced the followers of Joanna Southcott, who believed that the latter would give birth to Shiloh, or the new Messiah, as referred to by Lead.

Comment: This excerpt is Lead's description of the vision she had of Mount Sion, the second of the three "blessed worlds" (namely, Paradise, Mount Sion, and New Jerusalem). The sea is the traditional Hebrew symbol of evil, which correlates with Lead's assertion that only those who are perfect are able to cross it. In addition, the author notes that Mount Sion must be established in association with the church before New Jerusalem can descend.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "Mount Sion.--Now from hence, the spiritual man must take another remove, to see what doth lie for him beyond this region or principle, among the precious things that do flow from that rich ocean, which is betwixt Paradise, Mount Sion, and the New Jerusalem.--This is that glassy sea that is spoken of by the beloved John, upon which the conquerors are seen singing their songs of triumph; and it doth compass round the city, where is the residence of the Great King, the throne of the Lamb, and the Seven-sealing Powers, or Fountain-spirits of God, that do go forth from the most Holy One. Now this burning sea is for probation, there being none able to pass it, but they who have gotten a full, perfect, and thorough conquest over the Beast, and over his image; so as they nothing more of his mark do bear. They, and they only, can stand here; because they are signatured from this flaming glassy sphere, that will make bodies clear and shining as terrible chrystal.

"This kingdom of Mount Sion, where is an innumerable company of angels, with the church of the First-born; and in which are contained all the originals and living patterns of what was copied out by Moses who had a sight of them, must open itself and be established, before the kingdom of the New Jerusalem can come down, either invisibly or visibly. There is a necessity for the mediatorial and priestly kingdom to go before and make way for that." (28)

Comment: This excerpt discusses Lead's interpretation of the role of Elias in preparing the earth for the "fuller time and dispensation to come". The author also alludes to the descent of the New Jerusalem from above and of the gathering of heavenly spirits to Christ.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "This now is a dispensation of that time mentioned, of a gathering in of heavenly spirits to Christ, out of the reformed Paradise. But there is yet a fuller time and dispensation to come, that shall answer to the Jerusalem above, which is said to come down. Here is a Mount Sion church to be gathered out from among all churches of men, by the preparing ministry of an Elias spirit; who is to make ready against the Lord's return from that solemnized wedding with the present triumphant church. Now what is meant by this Elias spirit, but such a spirit as hath power to transform and translate at pleasure? THIS ELIAS IS NOT AN ABSTRACTED GHOST, BUT IS IN CONJUNCTION WITH A FLAMING BODY OF LIGHT. This was that which the apostles eyed much in their days, and had the revelation thereof FOR THE LATTER AGES." (31)

Comment: The most interesting aspect of this excerpt is the author's use of the word endued. This word derives from the Greek word enduo, meaning "to sink into a garment," and is found many times in the New Testament. However, the King James Version translators used the transliterated form only once, in Luke 24:49. Elsewhere, as in Ephesians 6:11, the same Greek word enduo is translated as put on. Thus, it is intriguing to note that Lead chose the term endued, which members of the LDS faith tend to associate with taking out a temple endowment. She further states that after being endued, one is protected from the trickery of the devil. In addition, she mentions the importance of watching and waiting for the day the Lord will return.

Excerpt (pages): "The word pending thus further in me: 'I shall put no other burden upon you, but that you hold fast the word of my counsel, which is to abide, and not start aside, till you be endued with all those ghostly powers, as the present occasion doth require. Then shall you know you are in that boundless circle, into which neither the Dragon, nor any of his adherents shall be able to break, to annoy, or to hurt.' Then was added this word; 'Blessed are those that are found watching and waiting, till the Lord shall appear in the full power of his Godhead, to magnify his own kingdom, and maintain the right thereof above all kingdoms of the world.' Even so, come Lord Jesus, and make good all of these thy faithful sayings, to the joy and praise both of the Jerusalem above, and of that beneath. For which waiting in all obedience, we acquiesce in thy will herein."

This excerpt was taken from a revelation dated June 1, 1823, as recorded by William Cooke. The speaker discusses the lost tribes and the fact that the Jews no longer know which tribe they belong to, noting that the tribe of Judah will be responsible for building Jerusalem. After calling for conversion to Christianity, the speaker closes with an allusion to the tree of life.

Excerpt (pages): "Now I tell thee, as I scattered my children the Jews, I have also scattered their wisdom, for there is not one of them knows what tribe he belongeth to; nor is there one of them knoweth whether he belongeth to my tribe Judah, which I, Jesus, will cause the Branch to spring from. Did not David my servant tell you that judgment should be given unto the king? And if you will choose me to be your king and captain, I will give righteousness to the king's son. This is my Branch which shall go forth and build Jerusalem.

"Now put all your strange gods and your pictures from you, and all your strange wives which you are not lawfully married unto, for ye shall be married unto me, and I will be your husband--ye shall be my brides, for I have prepared the robes, and I will let thee see that Israel shall have the crown, for this is what I have sworn unto--my holiness, and I will perform it.

Title of Article:
Place of Publication: Lexington, KY
Publisher: Thomas T. Skillman
Date of Publication: 1815
Library Location: Shaw and Shoemaker Collection, Microfiche 34134
Nature of Source: This is the publication of a sermon given at the Annual Meeting of the Bible Society of Kentucky. This society emphasized the importance of providing copies of the Bible to those unable to afford their own, as well as producing additional copies at an inexpensive rate to facilitate one's procuration of the scriptures. This sermon concerns the Last Days, especially what the author envisions will be characteristic of the Millennium.

Comment: This particular excerpt is taken from Bishop's introduction, where he outlines the creation. In this passage, he essentially argues that although happiness existed in the Garden of Eden, the fall made it possible for wickedness to prevail. In addition, the author notes that happiness will not reign again until the Millennium.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "Man was originally made after God's own image. The image of the immortal God was originally instamped on the human soul. Holiness and happiness were the original inheritance of the human race; and Jehovah thus dwelt in man, and on the earth. By the introduction of sin into the human constitution Jehovah was driven from his own earth, and from the government of his own creatures. Disorder and wickedness of every kind have ever since marked the history of the world. God is not in all man's thoughts, and consequently is not to be seen in any part of his conduct. This state of things is not, however, to continue always. However long the reign of sin and desolation may have been, it is not to be eternal: a period shall arrive when man shall be once more exhibited on earth, in the image of his maker, and when God shall dwell with man, and man dwell with God." Comment: This revelation is dated April 23, 1823, as recorded by Robert Harling. In this particular passage, Wroe discusses a figurative place of refuge, namely, the "ark" Israel will help establish. In addition, Wroe contrasts the wicked and the righteous, distinguishing between redemption and salvation, yet notes that the judgment will be "speedy" and relatively easy.
"I will give what tribe every one belongs to, that they may be ready for the ark which I have shewed thee, which I will cause my children Israel to prepare; then it shall be seen who are seeking common salvation, and who are seeking both salvation and redemption. Did I not cause Paul to tell you to go on to perfection? and those that will have only one part of my scriptures, shall not taste of my kingdom, for I told you to go on to perfection, for I will make a speedy separation from amongst [sic] you; I will put the sheep on the right hand, the goats on the left, and my son Shiloh shall drive the goats from the face of the earth, that I may behold my sheep from heaven; for I told you in my father's house were many mansions, and my Branch shall separate you, for I will have no more the preaching of Satan. I have prepared a road, and Satan stands in the road telling my children the road is too narrow, and inviting them to stop; have not I the Lord of heaven and earth, set a lamp in the way--and sworn by my holiness that I would set a watch upon the walls of Jerusalem, which shall never hold their tongue day nor night, till I establish my kingdom?" (21)
Prophecies. Third ed. (Boston, 1849), 27-28., the Jews are referred to as the visible Hebrews, while the Gentiles are described as the invisible Hebrews. Thus, Wroe believed he needed to sift out the "true Israelites" from among both the Jews and the Gentiles. [Note: "Joannes Roes" is the latinized form of Wroe's name occasionally used by his scribes.]

And go to the Gentile priests, and tell them they are not Gentiles; but if they will ask of me, I will make them Gentiles of the true Israelites, for I will confound all that call themselves Gentiles and are not. Comment: This excerpt, taken from a revelation dated April 20, 1824, as recorded by William Tillotson, discusses the bestowal of the promised land to Israel. According to the speaker, unlike the promised land of the past, during the Millennium, Israel will possess the entire earth and will be free from all enemies.

Excerpt (pages): "I the Lord, who created man at first, and brought forth an help-mate for him--I will now prove myself, that that which I recorded in the scriptures shall not return void, but I will fulfil it saith the Lord of all; and that evil fruit which Satan caused her to hand unto man, shall return upon Satan's head, and I will let man see that she has brought forth the good fruit, and I will cause man to eat it without the sweat of his brow, and it shall come to him without labour; as I gave the manna, so will I give them the good fruit, this promised land is not like the promised land that the children of Israel entered before, for there was their enemies around them, and Satan tempting me to curse them, and that blessing which I gave them was only a shadow of this, for I will give them the planet for a possession; and as I prepared me angels and cherubims to minister unto me, so have I prepared servants for Israel for a thousand years." Comment: This excerpt is taken from a revelation recorded by William Lees and dated November 29, 1823, while Wroe was travelling in Milan. This particular passage concerns the destruction surrounding the Second Coming of Christ. The speaker (Wroe's Lord) asserts that only the 144,000 mentioned of in the Book of Revelation will survive the destruction, after which they will inherit the earth. Christ (Shiloh) shall rule. Thus, this excerpt indicates that the Wroeites were premillennialists.

Excerpt (pages): "And when I send forth my destruction you shall sing the song of Moses and the Lamb, for I will give it, and no one shall be able to learn this song but the hundred and forty-four thousand: for my son Shiloh shall give the whole earth to this number for a possession, and he shall reign over them." Comment: This revelation is dated July 3, 1824, as recorded by William Muff. This particular passage concerns the Millennium, both the preceding events, including the destruction of the wicked, as well as the circumstances which will characterize the thousand years of peace, including the literal interpretation of the lamb and the lion. This provides evidence that the Wroeites were premillennialists, for they believed that a cataclysmic change would usher in the coming of Christ.

Excerpt (pages):

"...for the whole earth shall burn as an oven, and there shall be kings and rulers among this number which are in the caves and holes of the earth: and at that day will my scriptures be fulfilled, where the first is last, and last first, and the poorest of my flock shall leap for joy. And I will now tell thee what I will do unto my flock; I will make their deeds known on the house top: this is to all who have the mark of their God upon them. For I will thrash my wheat till it be ready for my granary, and I will make thee the thrashing instrument, and thou shalt thrash the wheat till the husks be gone from it; and then the husks will I burn at my coming. The evil spirits that are among my children are the weeds; and I will cause an east wind to come at my coming, and it shall blow them into that place which I have prepared for them. Then ye shall see whether the earth shall give her increase, for the great army shall be seen no more in the earth; for Satan brought them forth for the disobedience of my children, and he has sown the tares. [author's footnote: Satan sowed the tare by man.] Ye now fallow your land one year, but I will no fallow it, and I will burn it up that there be no weed; and after my fallow shall it yield a thousand years without fallow. And at that day there shall not be seen an animal on the earth that lives one on another; for at this day one animal eats another, and men murder one another. Now if I had been prince of this world you would have charged me with this, but his work is like those that say my scriptures contradict one another, and they are not true; and I will confound them, and they shall reel to and fro like a drunkard "There shall be a book printed of the singing-women which shall sing in my holy temple, seventy thousand shall there be, and the account shall be delivered from every place: seventy thousand men shall there be, and they that play on instruments shall sing at times, for they are in the number; these shall attend my house. This number shall come out of every tribe, that I may have a part, and every time that they come out of all nations to my house, it shall be a feast unto them, a feast of gladness and rejoicing. This number shall live at Jerusalem, and their offspring shall depart according to their heritage. The star of this number shall shine bright, for it is a great number; for they shall be the fathers of many nations, and where the king is there shall they be. But the twenty-four elders shall be in twenty-four provinces, sitting as judges; they shall receive of me, and hand unto my people." (81-82)

Comment: This revelation was dated September 10, 1824, as recorded by William Tillotson. The speaker in this revelation is simply referred to as a voice; it is likely the angel Uriel mentioned in the body of the passage, who occasionally delivers the Lord's revelations to Wroe, rather than the Lord speaking directly to Wroe as he claims happens in most of his other revelations. This same angel generally serves as Wroe's guide while he is in the midst of his visions. The following excerpt discusses the establishment of a place of refuge in a promised land. From other revelations (see p. 76), the reader may assume that this place of refuge may be found in England. Those who remain outside the walls are in danger of destruction unless they can prove "they have clean meat." This may be interpreted either figuratively (the meat representing works), or literally, since the Wroeites abstained from eating pork's flesh, considering it to be unclean.

Excerpt (pages): "And thou shalt tell them, that the angel Uriel has met with thee to tell thee that, if Israel will gather themselves together, that the Lord will lead them unto a place where there is no weed, a choice place, a place where the vine will grow, where there is a tabernacle drawn over it, where the frost air cannot blow, where the sun cannot scorch it--where there is no stones but choice earth: there is a wall round it high and lofty, so that the foul air cannot blow on it; the doors thereof are high and lofty, (which are twelve in number,) doors which Satan cannot enter, a building that is pleasant, the ground-work is laid, the gates are set up, the walls are built. And thou shalt tell them that Uriel has told thee, if they come not out from among the weed, that Uriel has heard from the Lord God of Hosts that there is a charge given by the living God of Israel, that the thunder-bolts will descend from every corner of the heavens, and will burn up and destroy all the weed if they come not out. and those that will not cry out to be lifted up from among the weed, they are to be burned and destroyed with the weed, saith the Lord. . . And thou shalt tell them that Uriel has sent thee unto them, to tell them that the seals will be opened, and that he lion of the tribe of Judah is descending from the heavens to view his garden, and he will roar like a lion, and they shall hear his voice from every quarter of the earth, and he shall cry, 'Destroy them all, destroy them all.' Then there is a charge to the angels that he whole ball shall be burnt up; and at that day their hiding-places shall be uncovered, and their sting of the serpent shall be discovered; . . .then they shall be afraid one of another--and those that have eaten of the sting of the serpent which is their king--they shall destroy one another, and eat one another; and they shall cry out for hunger like a hungry man. . . .And thou art commanded not to eat of their abominable meat, but if they can bring thee clean meat thou wilt eat; and if they can prove to thee that they have clean meat, that the Lord will not burn up this ball, but will preserve it for their sake; but if they cannot prove it, thou art commanded to tell them that it will be destroyed within the forty and two years, and that their months are lengthened into years to see if they will seek the Lord their God; for Jonah was commanded to cry, Yet forty days,--and the days were made into years; and so now the Lord has commanded thee to say, Yet within forty months, the whole earth shall be burnt up and destroyed. And let this be read on two of their sabbaths, which is Sunday, to the rebellious house of the Gentiles, the seed of Esau, which curses their God with unclean meat between their teeth,--and thou shalt say, these are the words which thou art commanded to utter before the rebellious house." (97-100) Prophecies. Although the author of this work remains anonymous, it was clearly written by a supporter of John Ward, who later took upon himself the name Zion. The stated purpose of this pamphlet is to refute the argument of the Reverend T.P. Foley, one of the earliest and most loyal disciples of Joanna Southcott. Following the prophetess' death in 1814, many claimed to be Southcott's successor, yet Foley and various others, such as Jane Townley and William Sharp, who together comprised the "Old Guard," rejected them all. One of these claimants was Zion Ward, who declared he was the Shiloh whose coming Southcott had prophesied of. Most likely either he or his followers wrote this pamphlet.

Comment: In this excerpt, the author sets forth his perception of the second coming of Christ, relying heavily on his interpretation of Matthew 8:23-27. Essentially, he argues that the Second Coming will not be characterized by Christ as a resurrected being descending out of heaven, but will instead be a spiritual coming. This complies with Ward's assertion that he was possessed by the spirit of Christ and, therefore, was Christ.

Excerpt (pages): "Various are the opinions, and great have been the controversies among many who have believed in the coming of the Lord, of how he would come; the greater part contending that he must come in person, the same that came among the Jews two thousand years ago. But others have differed with these, contending that he must come in the spirit; in this, so far, they have said the truth; but how that coming in spirit would be, they have not been able to satisfy either themselves or their hearers: but had they understood what is recorded in Matth. viii. 23--27, they would have known the precise way of his coming. Jesus enters into a ship with his disciples; the ship represents a human being, in whom he comes in the end; the violent storm in which the ship is overtaken, represents the spiritual sufferings this character has to pass through in finding out the ocean deep of the mysteries of God's word; and Jesus rising up, after being asleep, and rebuking the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm, it shows that the Lord is risen up in the appointed instrument as one out of sleep, and by the wisdom and power of his word stilleth first the raging storm of Satan's malice against his creature that was like the ship covered with the waves; and it shows further, that in his creature he will hush into stillness the raging waves of the sea of the world of evil, who reject the light of his spirit in his word, who are foaming out their own shame, speaking in ignorance against the kingdom of God; and will, in spite of their combined influence and power, cause the little leaven to leaven the whole lump, and establish the great calm of his righteous and peaceable reign on the earth, though hell from beneath is moved now to meet him at his coming." Comment: This excerpt begins with a description of the earth during the Millennium, likening it to the Garden of Eden. Of interest is Lead's interpretation of the role of Adam, noting that he was intended to remain paradisiacal, but failed. Thus, she adds, God was required to come as man to compensate. Furthermore, she notes that the name "Elijah" is synonymous with "Shiloh" and the "Anointed of God."

Excerpt (pages):

"...but they shall also be able to transmute all gross metals into transparent gold, so as it shall be far more plentiful than in Solomon's time. This very gross earth on which we now tread shall be made chrysaline. The river that was divided into four heads, which have been cut off ever since Adam was turned out of Paradise, shall now be made to return with a full stream, to bring forth the Seed of Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx Stone in a Sparkling Glory. Mansion-houses here shall be built, and goodly tents pitched, which shall exceed all the structures which have ever yet been; for these dwelling-places shall be magical, sometimes visible and at other times invisible, according to the pleasure of the blessed inhabitants, who dwell therein in everlasting security.

"This, my brethren, is a confirmation of what I have told you, Adam (had he continued paradisiacal) was to have done, therefore God's purpose will stand, and as Adam the first failed, God himself became man, in order that this world should not remain part evil and part good beyond the time he decreed, when he caused Man (his Son) to become an angel, with a corporeal body, and to be the vanquisher and exterminator of all the evil which the Fall of Angels had introduced; and therefore you see, my brethren, that God in Christ will, in the sixth day of the New Creation, bring forth as many men (for to restore the earth and its creatures to its Sabbath of rest) as was manifested in the first creation, and as one man, even Adam I believe, will be again the first, and Scripture characterises him under the names of Shiloh, Elijah, and Branch of Righteousness; which terms are all synonymous, and imply the Anointed of God." Comment: This revelation, dated May 28, 1824, as recorded by John Taylor, discusses the character of the earth during the Millennium, when the twelve tribes (the righteous) will possess the earth. Author: Robert Hamilton Bishop
Title of Book: The Glory of the Latter Days: A Sermon

Title of Periodical:
During the Millennium, a great change shall be visible in the qualifications and general character of those who shall minister in holy things. Every son of Aaron shall then be fully qualified for the station which he shall occupy, and he shall faithfully attend to the duties of that station. [Bishop then quotes Malachi 3:3-4 and Ezekiel 44:10-16, 22-24]. . .

"The priesthood shall be distinguished by their clear and faithful exhibition of divine truth. They will be men of strong minds and evangelical principles. They shall also be distinguished by their impartiality and vigor, in exercising the government and the discipline of the church. In controversy, they shall stand in judgment, and they shall judge it, not according to passion or prejudice, or this or that; but according to MY judgments. In all God's courts, they will keep and cause to be kept God's statutes. And they shall Hallow my Sabbath.

"By their personal piety they will also be distinguished. For in the day that the priest goeth into the sanctuary unto the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer His own sin offering.

"In fine, the priesthood of that day shall have little or no connection with secular offices-they shall have no possession in Israel; they shall devote themselves wholly to their sacred functions, and concern themselves not with the affairs of the world. verse 28.

"What a change! Instead of a weak, and an ignorant, and an envious, and a careless, and a wanton, and a worldly-minded, and a self-seeking, and worldly accommodating priesthood, the church shall be blest with men of the first rate piety, with men of the first rate talents, and with men who shall themselves be examples of every thing that is amiable, to break unto the children of the great family the bread of life. . .

"Those who minister in holy things, and who shall thus devote their whole time and talents to their work, shall be decently supported by those for whose benefit they labour, and all other necessary expenses attending the dispensation of ordinances shall be freely and liberally discharged. [He then quotes Ezekiel 44:30-31; 48:8-14]

"A variety of other passages may be produced to the same amount. In fact, a single passage describing at length the glory of the latter days, is not to be found, where a liberal devoting of the good things of this life to the service of the sanctuary, holds not a distinguished place. It is a great law of our nature, that men will give cheerfully and liberally to that which their hearts are attached. In the period of which we now speak, men's hearts will be attached to God's honour and God's service on earth, and attached to these, as the most interesting of all objects below the sun. It will follow then as a thing of course, that neither God's servants nor God's work will in any degree suffer or languish for the want of any of the good things of this life. The enquiry among the members of the great family will not be, 'How little can we bestow to this or the other object, connected with the advancement of the interests of Messiah's kingdom, and still maintain some kind of standing in society;' but how much is it our incumbent duty to bestow." This society emphasized the importance of providing copies of the Bible to those unable to afford their own, as well as producing additional copies at an inexpensive rate to facilitate one's procuration of the scriptures. This sermon concerns the Last Days, especially what the author envisions will be characteristic of the Millennium.

Comment: Among the characteristics outlined by Bishop in his sermon is a great change which he perceives will take place in the character of the people (22). According to Bishop, the Bible and the doctrines it espouses "form the great medium through which this great change in the moral state of man is to be effected" (24). As a result, he urges his congregation to engage in extensive missionary work to ensure that their "heathen" neighbors might also undergo this great change.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson
Excerpt (pages): "Would each of us just take a spare hour, and endeavor to cast up in his own mind, and to assist him, let him mark it down on paper--how many of his friends and neighbours are at this very hour evidently, and many of them avowedly without Christ, aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. The result of an inquiry of this kind would likely astonish the most of us.
"We express on almost every occasion our sympathy for the heathen in Africa, and Asia, and in the remote quarters of the globe. And we do well to sympathize with these--we do well daily and hourly to pray for these--we do well to embrace every opportunity to send the gospel to these. But shall we take no notice of the heathen in our own houses; on our streets; living within the very next door; many of whom are closely connected with us, by every endearing tie--the tie of the religion of Jesus only excepted? As the number of heathen thus within our reach, thus under our influence, thus committed to our care, is immense--so the guilt under which we and our churches lie on their account is enormous. . .

"We are encouraged to exert ourselves in the great and good cause from the aspect of the times. It is no time, christian [sic] friends, to keep our hands in our bosoms. Jehovah has come out of his place, and has terribly shaken the earth. His great work of blood which is to precede the latter day glory is begun--is far advanced: that it is finished we are not prepared to say. . ." (30-32)

It appears that her writings later influenced the followers of Joanna Southcott, who believed that the latter would give birth to Shiloh, or the new Messiah, as referred to by Lead.

Comment: This excerpt is taken from "Sixty Propositions to the Philadelphian Society withersover Dispersed." In this section, Lead acknowledges the need for a new church with a new name which will distinguish it from Babylon. In addition, the author notes that the church will be formed and prepared secretly as it "is yet to be born," but it will eventually encompass the earth. She states the importance for the church to be anointed in order for it to bear the name of Christ. Once such a church exists, Lead argues, Christ will come again. However, she notes that no such perfect, anointed church currently exists.

Excerpt (pages): "9. The unsealing of the living testimony, within the ark of the Lord, must begin the promulgation of the everlasting gospel of the kingdom.
"10. The proclamation of this testimony of the kingdom will be as by the sound of a trumpet, to alarm all the nations of the earth, and more especially all the professions of christianity, because attended with the power of acting all wonders.

"11. So there shall be an authoritative decision given forth immediately from Christ, to the putting an end to all controversies concerning the true Church.

"12. This decision will be, by the actual sealing of the members of this Church, with the name of God; giving them a commission to act by virtue of the same. This new name will distinguish them from the seven thousand names of Babylon.

"13. The ELECTION and PREPARATION of this Church is to be after a secret and hidden manner; as David in his minority was elected and anointed by the prophet of the Lord, yet was not admitted to the outward possession of the kingdom for a considerable time afterward.

"14. Of the stem of David, a virgin Church, which hath known nothing of man, or of human constitution, is yet to be born. . . .

"20. Hereby all nations shall be brought into it, so that it shall be the Catholic Church, according to the genuine sense and utmost latitude of the word.

"21. It must be an anointed Church; whereby it may truly bear the name of Christ or Christian; being with him anointed to the priestly, prophetical, and royal dignity. . . .

"23. This Catholic and anointed church must be perfectly holy, as Christ himself is holy; so that it may worthily bear the name of the Lord our Holiness, and the Lord our Righteousness.

"24. Until there be such a church made ready upon the earth, so holy, so catholic, and so anointed, that is without spot or wrinkle, and that is adorned as a bride to meet her bridegroom, Christ will not personally descend to solemnize this marriage, and present the same to his Father.

"25. But when the bridal church shall be made ready, and thoroughly cleansed and sanctified from every spot of defilement through the blood of Christ, then he will no longer delay his coming in person.

"26. There is not this day visible upon the earth any holy catholic, anointed and bridal church; all the churches and professions, being found light, when weighed in the balance: therefore they are rejected by the Supreme Judge.

"27. Which rejection and condemnation will be for this end, that out of them a new and glorious church may rise up, in whom there shall be no fault to be found, like as he findeth none with the PHILADELPHIA. Rev. iii." (48-50)

Excerpt (pages): "The New Jerusalem.--This city is more glorious and magnificent than what hath been made mention of; far surpassing the glories of the two lower blessed worlds [i.e., Paradise and Mount Sion]. As to the walls and foundation of it, with the gates that open into it, they are all so diaphanous and full of splendorous light, that it is altogether impossible to make it out, even in any degree, according as it hath been exhibited and seen in the spirit, in the metaphorical figure of it, which yet represents very much short of the spiritual substantiality of this city, which is God himself dilating and spreading forth his Godhead in such amazing varieties. This is a principle and world, which none but Christ in his glorified humanity, with such high saints as are glorified with his glory, can have access to. Of which inconceivable abundance of glory those do with him continually participate, ascending and descending as cause requireth. No pass there is into this city, but through the glassy sea; which sea, none do stand and tread upon, but such spirits that are qualified and clothed upon with the self-same matter, which is all chrystaline water and transparent fire. O how am I lost out of myself, while this globe of light and all the wonders therein do open! For in this interim, it was said to me, Behold! all the weights of glory have I prepared not only for pleasure to myself, but for such as do love, and put on their Lord Christ in deiformity; and so as conquerors, pass through the glassy sea, and enter through the gates, having this city written upon their foreheads.

"It remains to open the more mystical sense of the invisible eternity of this mother city, that, from the Father, in union with his Virgin Wisdom, doth multiply and so fill up that principle with virgin spirits, that are most perfectly pure and immaculate; whence it is, that nothing beyond this can any of the redeemed arrive to, (till after that work, which MAN at first was manifested to do, is accomplished.) Mount Sion kingdom is most great and glorious, but yet inferior to this, because that is in the mediatorship of Christ; but in this world, all is completed and finished; so that, when this New Jerusalem shall descend, it will soon put this old, sinful, and impure world to an end." This volume is the first of a three volume collection of John Wroe's visions and revelations that were putatively communicated to him by the Spirit. Due to a relative lack of education, Wroe found it necessary to recruit scribes from among his disciples who could then record his revelations. He was one of the many successors of Joanna Southcott, a self-proclaimed prophetess in early nineteenth century England, and he founded the sect of Christian Israelites, whose stronghold concentrated in the English towns of Bradford and Ashton-under-Lyne. Wroe attempted to transform the latter into a New Jerusalem, although he was forced to leave in 1831 due to sexual misconduct. From then on, he continued to receive and publish revelations and sought disciples elsewhere in Great Britain, as well as in the United States and Australia.

This excerpt, taken from a revelation Wroe claims to have received while travelling in Europe on October 23, 1823, describes plans for a New Jerusalem to be built in England, in particular the house of the speaker (Wroe's Lord). The house is to be built on foundations of the tribes of Israel and will serve as a protection for his people.

Excerpt (pages): "I have shewn thee strange things since I took thee, and I will shew thee greater. And I have shewn thee my house, which shall be built; but it is not like those thou hast seen upon this earth. And the foundations by their tribes, according as they are written in my scriptures; but the throne shall be in the middle of the building, and shall be the height of the fourth foundation, which will be the tribe of Judah, so that all the foundations will have an equal view of the throne. Now this building shall be according to this view which I have given thee.

"Thou meditates in thy mind which way this building is to be built. Now I will tell thee the way: I will gather these two staffs of people into one place, in England, which shall be an hundred and forty-four thousand; and I will plead with all flesh for this people; and I will send my flaming sword of fire to protect them; and I will destroy all nations; and this land, Enlgand [sic], shall be the first redeemed; and the remnant which shall be left, shall say, 'Let us be your servants, and we will bear our own reproach, for we know that God is with you; and let our offspring be your offspring's servants, that we may be called by your name.'" Nature of Source: This is one of thirty pamphlets published individually between 1829 and 1831 in England, yet later compiled into one book. This particular work was written by Jane Lead, a mystic who claimed to have received personal revelation and prophecy in the 1600s. It appears that her writings later influenced the followers of Joanna Southcott, who believed that the latter would give birth to Shiloh, or the new Messiah, as referred to by Lead.

Comment: This excerpt appears to take a more literal interpretation of the phrase "outpouring of the Spirit". It seems that Lead is implying that the spirits of former prophets and saints are currently possessing the bodies of righteous people to thereby prepare the way for the coming of Christ. She also discusses the deliverance of Zion and the descent of the New Jerusalem. This is all to take place prior to the "spiritual nativity" of Christ, this time "for full conquest and dominion."

Researcher: Gretchen Olson
Excerpt (pages): "The blessed Saints above, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Virgins, &c. are descending and ingenerating themselves through the Spirit, into many Holy Souls at this day, to accompany the blessed Jesus in his spiritual nativity, not as before, for Suffering, but for full conquest and dominion. Some to see their prophecies fulfilled, and concur in the execution of it; others, the JEWS MOST ESPECIALLY, TO OBTAIN THE PROMISES OF AN EARTHLY GLORIOUS KINGDOM UNDER THEIR GLORIFIED MESSIAH: all to receive the blessing and answer to their Faith and Hope, their Prayers and Tears whilst on Earth, groaning for the Times of Refreshment, the deliverance of Sion, and the Triumphs of the Church Militant here upon Earth: for the introducing of which, they now concur with us in the Spiritual Wars against the Enemies of the Kingdom; and in the Divine Union or communion of saints in the Holy Spirit. Thus enlarging (through conquest and propagation of their Spirit,) their own particular borders and portion, or the sphere of their own dominion and kingdom, as well below as above.

"The Holy Angels, Archangels, Principalities, and Powers of Heaven, are coming down also, impregnating and ingenerating themselves into holy and prepared souls: and thus taking up each their proper post and station, for attendance upon the Mighty FATHER, the Eternal TRINITY, the Holy JESUS, with the Virgin WISDOM, and the seven Spirits, that are before the throne of God, descending into nature, and bringing down the NEW JERUSALEM upon Earth, therein to TABERNACLE WITH MEN, and maintain a Heaven, as it were, within this lower principle; and gradually to begin and work out the New Creation of all things. And this in compensation, and reverse of the suffering state of the Holy JESUS, both in his Person while on earth, and in his Members, ever since crowned with thorns, derided, and crucified." (9-10)

This brief excerpt describes the need for a true church, which is yet to be "born," yet it is unclear whether Lead interprets the "offspring" figuratively or literally. In addition, she notes that this church will be distinguished by "terrible things" it causes to take place through the "Ghostly Power" it possesses.

Comment: Although she acknowledges in a footnote that the imagery of the ark is not intended to be understood literally, Lead nevertheless notes the importance of the creation of some sort of place of refuge which will save the righteous from the burning fires when the earth is destroyed. Lead refers to what is normally termed the Second Coming as the Third, because she believes the second has already taken place through the outpouring of the spirit of Christ.

Nature of Source: This is the publication of a sermon given at the Annual Meeting of the Bible Society of Kentucky. This society emphasized the importance of providing copies of the Bible to those unable to afford their own, as well as producing additional copies at an inexpensive rate to facilitate one's procuration of the scriptures. This sermon concerns the Last Days, especially what the author envisions will be characteristic of the Millennium.

Comment: This passage is taken from an appendix to Bishop's sermon, entitled "The Slaying of the Witnesses." It begins with a quote from Revelation 11:3, 7, 8. Of note is the unusual interpretation of this and related scriptures.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "When are the witnesses to be slain? Not within but after the expiration of the 1260 prophetic days. They are to prophecy all that period--that is, all the time of the reign of Antichrist. vs. 3.

"This period ended in 1792, when the power of the man of sin was broken, particularly in France and Italy, by the French Revolution. But the witnesses are not yet slain. In all the astonishing events which have taken place since, there is nothing which looks any thing like this--and the language in the passage before us, authorises us to say, that when they are slain the action shall speak for itself. Their dead bodies are to be exposed three days and an half in the street of the great city.

"The city is the Roman earth; that is, those countries in Europe, which formed a part of the Roman Empire, and in which Antichrist was exhibited for ages. The great street must be the center, and the most public part of the city. and this can be no other but France, Spain, and Italy. In these countries then, we are to look for the horrid carnage, "What is the distinguishing characteristics of these countries at this moment? By twenty years sever visitation the power of Antichrist is indeed broken in these--but the spirit remains as vigorous, and as bloody as ever...

"By whom are they to be slain? When they shall have finished their testimony 'saith the prophecy,' the beast that ASCENDETH out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and kill them. chapter xi. verse 7.

"The beast which is here spoken of, is a different beast from either of the beasts which are described in the xiii. chapter. The first of these beasts rises out of the sea, and the second comes out of the earth; but this one ascendeth out of the bottomless pit.

"If we turn to the xvii. chapter, we will find this third beast, again introduced. See particularly verse 8. The chief difference betwixt the xiii. and xvii. chapters is this. In the xiii. chap. Antichrist in the form of the first and second beasts, is exhibited in his power--in the splendor of his reign, during the 1260 days. In chap. xvii. Antichrist is exhibited in the form of a third beast, but on the eve of complete destruction, and after the period of the 1260 days is expired. [Bishop then quotes Rev. 17:12-14]

"The short duration of the power of these kings, is proof positive, that we are not to find them where they have often been sought for, among the Gothic kingdoms which were established on the ruins of the Roman Empire...

"In the arrangements now made, or which are now making for the government of France, Spain, and Italy, we may then expect to see Ten distinct sovereign Popish powers established. These shall be actuated with one spirit, and shall unite in their exertions to establish the Roman Catholic superstition as fully as ever it was established, and in these exertions they shall slay the witnesses, and procure their own complete destruction.

"Antichrist in his third and last form ascends out of the bottomless pit. The restoration of these weak, narrow minded rulers, to their own thrones, or to the thrones of their ancestors, especially after such exertions had been made for an order of things of a quite different nature, is astonishing. It is nothing less than miraculous. Men of all religious and political creeds, had given them and their cause up as forever lost.

"The beast in this last form ascendeth out of the bottomless pit, and shall go unto perdition. These ten kings have powers as kings, only one hour. They shall be exhibited only to shew the implacable, the devilish spirit of Antichrist, and to be destroyed. The beast shall also in this state, be literally, the beast which was, and is not, and YET is. It shall scarcely have an existence." (39-46)

Comment: Bishop outlines eight specific preceding events and/or characteristics of the Millennium:
1. the Millennium is to follow "an unparalleled scene of bloodshed and destruction" (6),
2. there will be a simultaneous extension of the gospel throughout the earth,
3. during the Millennium, "public ordinances shall be regularly and universally attended" (10),
4. "a great change shall be visible in the qualifications and general character of those who shall minister in holy things" (13), including great personal piety and avoiding things of the world,
5. those who hold the priesthood will be supported by those whom they preach to,
6. the members of the church will be characterized by genuine piety,
7. "oppression and acts of injustice shall cease" (21), and
8. "in all matters in which men are concerned, the divine presence shall be enjoyed, and his blessing seen and felt, to an extent hitherto unknown" (23). Bishop argues that the spread of the Bible and the doctrines which it espouses will give rise to a change in the general character of the people, thereby making an appeal for an increased proselyting effort.

Nature of Source: This was an individual pamphlet published in Great Britain, yet later combined with 29 other similar writings in a compilation entitled Divine Revelations and Prophecies. Although the author of this work remains anonymous, it was clearly written by a supporter of John Ward, who later took upon himself the name Zion. The stated purpose of this pamphlet is to refute the argument of the Reverend T.P. Foley, one of the earliest and most loyal disciples of Joanna Southcott. Following the prophetess' death in 1814, many claimed to be Southcott's successor, yet Foley and various others, such as Jane Townley and William Sharp, who together comprised the "Old Guard," rejected them all. One of these claimants was Zion Ward, who declared he was the Shiloh whose coming Southcott had prophesied of. Most likely either he or his followers wrote this pamphlet.

Comment: This brief passage discusses the criteria for offering judgment. The author notes that according to the writings of Joanna Southcott, only those who suffer are capable of judging properly. Thus, Mr. Foley, even though he is a reverend, lacks the qualifications to allow him to judge. This differs from the Latter-day Saint view of judgment, which notes that all bishops will be judges in Israel.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "Does Mr. F[oley] profess to have a divine revelation? or, who has made him a judge? Let him know that it is he that suffers that must be the judge, as saith the word by Joanna, viz. 'If man is the sufferer, man must be the judge.' No man can be a judge of the truth of the Lord's word, but he that suffers as is described in the Psalms."

Comment: This revelation is dated February 24, 1828, as recorded by William Tillotson. This particular excerpt discusses millennial conditions, as well as the initial judgment which will take place at the time of the Lord's coming. Although the term "three degrees of glory" is not mentioned specifically within the body of the passage, the speaker describes three groups of people who will be judged. In addition, the excerpt is consistent with premillennial ideology, in that it acknowledges the literal coming of Christ at the beginning of the Millennium, after which a final judgment will be made and Satan ultimately destroyed.

Now I will shew thee the three sets of people which shall stand before me when I am revealed on the earth, at the first resurrection. First those that have renewed their soul, these shall be made like the angels, these shall not generate nor bring forth their own likeness, these shall ascend and descend; thou hast seen them, and these are become the ministering incorruptible bodies, these shall minister unto me during my whole day of rest, and to my sons, these shall neither marry nor give in marriage. Now I will shew thee the second number of people which shall take hold of the law and gospel, which shall become life in them, the number of them I have given thee, a hundred and forty-four thousand, the world calls these vessels of dishonor, but I will make them vessels of honor, these have sought me for soul and body, and their buildings to be finished, this will I perform in the sight of all the world, and behold it is but the sixth day, these shall learn the song that I have kept hid from others, these shall both marry and give in marriage, these shall bring forth their own likenesses, and generate, not in blood, these their buildings shall be finished. Now as I have brought forth my own likeness by the Branch, so shall these bring forth their likeness, for they shall all bear twain.

"So now I will shew thee the third set of people which shall stand before me at that day, there shall be a number of people which shall creep into the holes and the clefts of the rocks, and these shall come out, and desire to be called by the name of Israel, that the reproach may be taken from them, and they shall crave to be servants, and it shall be granted them, and they shall live one day, which is a thousand years, then Satan shall be loosed out of his prison. I will then destroy the last enemy, and I will cause him that is the enemy--death, to deliver up the dead, and I will then judge between them and him, I will then make a final end of him, he shall no more reign over that which I have made, for I will ransom it out of his hands, and remove his power. So now I have shewn to my children vessels of dishonor, and vessels of honor, during my day of rest, and I will shew to man that I labour with the vessels of dishonor as well as vessels of honor. Does not a man take his best clothing to pretend to worship before me? and the six days that he labours, the clothing of dishonor? So, I say, three days have I chosen me to labour, and behold the fourth, which shall be a day of rest to all flesh, one day for every generation, which are two thousand years, which make up six thousand years that I will labour, and the seventh day I will rest." Comment: This particular excerpt addresses the role of the priesthood during the Millennium. She argues that those priests who will participate in the first resurrection are those who removed all aspects of the world from their lives, and as a result, they will govern the earth prior to the coming of Christ. She adds that they will be viewed as reigning with Christ because they will be so righteous, they will act in the same manner Christ would.

Excerpt (pages): Lead attempts to answer the question of when the first resurrection will occur through an analysis of Revelations 20:4, which she quotes: "I saw the Souls that were beheaded for the Witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God, which had not worshipped the Beast, neither his Image, or received his Mark upon their Foreheads or Hands. These were they that lived and reigned with Christ a Thousand Years." She notes that those referred to in this scripture "are made Priests, to go in and out of the most Holy and inward Tabernacle, and Kings to reign over the Earth." (13) She adds that the action of beheading represents the removal of sin and earthliness from one's life. Next, she states that "SUCH AS THESE were shewn to me to be of the FIRST RESURRECTION, whom no mortal Death could have power over. This is that SINLESS HOLY PRIESTHOOD, that will proceed BEFORE CHRIST'S VISIBLE APPEARANCE. And, whereas it is said, they should reign with Christ, that is, with his life of the same purity and power, and sufficiency to act and do all great and MIGHTY WONDERS, as if he was in his own distinct Person of Glory, manifested upon the Earth. The key of the Government shall be entrusted and laid upon the shoulders of those, who are dead, and risen with Christ their Head. THESE ARE TO PUT ON THEIR SPIRITUAL BODIES." Comment: This excerpt explains the rationale behind Ward's assertion that he was that Shiloh Joanna had prophesied of, noting that he had been predestinated. Excerpt (pages): "And does not the word, by Joanna, declare, that the Psalms were never fulfilled in any man, but must be fulfilled in the son that was born of her in the year 1814? Then that son must be a man unto whom the spirit from her came, when it came forth from her, and she died, for her child was the spirit of truth: this was it with which she was impregnated; and this child, coming forth from her, and entering into a man, makes that man the son, the man child: and this man has to go through all that the Psalms speak of; for how could the Psalms be fulfilled upon her son, but by the son becoming a very man in the way here stated; for Joanna's son was the spirit of God, the Son of God; and by that spirit coming forth from her, and entering into a man, chosen and predestinated for this purpose: this was the way that he took man's nature upon him, clothing himself with a human body; and of this man it is written in Romans viii. 29, 30, 'Whom he (God) did foreknow, he also did predestinate, to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified.' The word is here plural, (them) because it is designed to set forth the character to whom it points, and that is Adam, male and female; therefore it says them he also justified, them he also glorified, &c." Excerpt (pages): "Now it was given me to understand, that there is a Threefold coming of Christ.--His first coming was in the flesh. After which, before he left the world, he engaged that he would come again in Spirit to his own that were in it. This has been accomplished. This was his Second Coming. Upon which we have lived, and spent upon this stock of Life ever since his departure. I mean such, who for this worthy gift, have, with great seeking, obtained it. This the Apostles had more richly and abundantly, as to the manifold working by powers and gifts, than any since. But yet they were still looking out for his next coming;--for, by his Spirit he was to make meet and ready: that the inward Spirit, with his Mind, Will, and Senses, should be all internally transformed; (as the New Testament runs much upon it) to be found sinless, spotless, and blameless, against the Coming of the Lord.

"And what is to be done at his third coming, but to change our vile bodies, and to fashion them like unto his own glorious body, by that power which shall open the Element, (the Eternal Nature) which the Celestial Body shall evermore consist of. Christ's third coming will be to this purpose, to redeem bodies out from all those evil events that Sin brought in, so that every spirit may come to have its own Native Body, and the Spirit may no longer draw one way and the Flesh another. . . .Then the great overturn in this Visible World will be, for those New Heavens and Earth to be known, and the Old Visible World, Heavens, and Elements, to pass away, and all flesh with them to be consumed. For no place for Terrestrial Bodies will be here, when this Great Day will come, which will burn as an Oven." (14-15)

Comment:  In this passage, Lead describes her vision of Paradise, the lowest of the three “blessed worlds” (namely, Paradise, Mount Sion, and New Jerusalem). She notes that prior to entry into Paradise, mortals must first die, after which they put on a “virgin body” to prepare to meet Christ. Those in Paradise include those who remained faithful, yet still lack perfection. While in Paradise, one may continue to progress in an effort to reach perfection, the end goal being the Tree of Life.

Researcher:  Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "Into Paradise my spirit doth first take its flight, where all things are in good order; the same flowing state, as before Adam had lost his Virgin mate. Paradise is now stocked again with such as have waded through the floating sea of sin and mortality, in order to the putting on the image of purity; which to the children of the resurrection, is given by Jesus. For not the least guile or fault may be found in any of the inhabitants of this place. My spirit doth see here, all in wonderful harmony: and this word was heard from the High and Lofty One, saying "With the risen from the dead I will dwell, though this principle of Paradise be allotted to them for a certain time, to be a separated mansion, until all be gathered into the superior kingdom of Mount Sion, and of the New Jerusalem." Thus did I hear the good news, that all is rich and flourishing within the Paradisiacal kingdom; nor is there any decay since Adam's day, but increase and augmentation is daily through the resurrection of the Spiritual man.

"After this, the Spirit of Wisdom said to me,--These things, whereof an account hath been given to you, may be declared of the local place of Paradise; whereinto spirits, separated by natural death, putting off their mortal earthly bodies, do enter; and there put on their virgin body, which doth prepare them to meet the Bridegroom, who from thence fetched them up to mount Sion. These are such, who in this very time, have fought the good fight of Faith, and had very near overcome this world. What is lacking to make them fully perfect, is to be done in this Paradisiacal place; where they are appointed to stay till all their bridal trimming is finished, and they find that they can pass the way to the Tree of Life, through the flaming cherub, who remaineth still a guard upon that figurative tree. In this place, holy angels do also wait by their course, to minister unto those who do come here as the designed heirs of that more glorious state which is revealed in Sion." (26-27)

Comment: In this excerpt, Lead argues that prior to the coming of Christ, some select people will be translated as Paul and John were. In addition, the author notes that translation is something to hope for and even "expect".

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "If there be nothing of this great change [translation] to happen upon some hereunto especially elected, till the great General Day of Judgment, when as the visible Elements shall pass away, and the World all broken up, then all Flesh will in it expire, and none be preserved to meet Christ, in his distinct AND PERSONAL Revelation and Coming, which, in its time, will be shewn. But before this, the Spirit doth affirm, as a truth, that he will come in his Kingdom to some, and so open their own Heavens, as he will both descend and ascend in, and from them, till they shall know the great Mystery of Translation, out of the Earth into the very Heavens, where Paul and John were SINCE CHRIST’S ASCENSION, both caught up in Spirit, and saw his glory, and heard the voice of his mouth. Paul, the Apostle, did not, at that time, know himself in a Mortal Form; though after he came down into it again, he had then such a divine sense of Immortal clothing, as he after desired to reach the Resurrection State, and to have Mortality swallowed up of Life. . . us, who are now not to look back, but forward, and to expect this Perfect thing, that can change this Corruptible into Incorruptibleness. . ." Comment: In this excerpt, Lead outlines the twelve "fruits" which comprise the tree of life, ranging from wisdom to goodness, to the power of creation. The author fails to provide any further explanation or analysis of what is meant by the various fruits or how one might obtain them. However, the use of the term "tree of life" is particularly interesting.

Publisher: John Wroe, for the Trustees of the People who have Surnamed themselves Israelites

Library Location: BYU Stacks BX 67999.C5 W76x 1845 vol.1

Nature of Source: This volume is the first of a three volume collection of John Wroe's visions and revelations that were putatively communicated to him by the Spirit. Due to a relative lack of education, Wroe found it necessary to recruit scribes from among his disciples who could then record his revelations. He was one of the many successors of Joanna Southcott, a self-proclaimed prophetess in early nineteenth century England, and he founded the sect of Christian Israelites, whose stronghold concentrated in the English towns of Bradford and Ashton-under-Lyne. Wroe attempted to transform the latter into a New Jerusalem, although he was forced to leave in 1831 due to sexual misconduct. From then on, he continued to receive and publish revelations and sought disciples elsewhere in Great Britain, as well as in the United States and Australia.

Comment: The following passage was taken from a revelation dated January 12, 1826. This passage includes a parable about the righteous in Zion. Zion is compared to a river, which also symbolizes the word of the Lord. According to the speaker, only those who live under both the law and the gospel will dwell in Zion, where the river (or word) can cleanse them, after which they will receive eternal life.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson

Excerpt (pages): "I will now explain to thee the tree of life, and the river which thou saw running between them: the living water that runneth between the two trees is my word; and the two trees which thou saw bearing fruit are those that are planted by the side of Zion. [author's footnote: Which are the man and the woman, and the rest of the trees are the members of her body.] Son of man, say, Thus saith the Lord, Thou will utter a parable before the whole house of Israel. A certain man had a river: he placed a large mountain on each side thereof, and he called forth labourers, that they might plant their trees, some on this side of the bank, and others on that side of the bank; they came forth with the planting of the trees, and called to the owner of the ground? The owner says, Plant where you will, but I call you to plant beside Zion. The labourers said, Where is Zion? The owner said, This river is Zion, and without this water ye cannot bring forth your children; ye may travail, but ye shall never be delivered. The labourer of the vineyard said, My lord, let me reason with thee, if I plant between these two mountains it will be dangerous, and it is narrow: there is the law on one side--there is the gospel on the other, and I can keep neither: and if I should break either of these, and they should push me into this water, I am drowned; but there is a large piece of ground here on this side of the mountain, cannot I plant here? and if I pass over this gulph and the other mountain, there is a large piece of land, I can plant there. So the owner of the ground looked upon it, and he saw it all planted. The words of the Lord came to the man who saw the whole ground planted with trees, and he said, Son of man, say thus saith the Lord, Are not these all with young? they cried to be delivered. So now look round and see who bears twain, and thou sees those that dwell between these two mountains at the side of this river, look little in the eyes the other. These have been under the law and the gospel. For I tell thee, one tree at the side of the river is the law, the other is the gospel: the water is my word made life in them, and they shall live as I live. And every three which is not planted between these two banks, that the water may cleanse them--they shall be destroyed, root and branch, from the face of the earth. This is my covenant with man. For I will cause four rivers to pass through the whole earth; and they shall water the face of my garden; for I tell thee the whole world is divided into two parts: one dwells on this side of the bank, and the other dwells on that side of the bank, but he that dwells within the bank, so that my river can cleanse him--he shall be washed clean, he shall see my kingdom, and his body not taste of death: his raiment shall shine whiter than the lily in the valley, for I will crown him with eternal life." "43. There may be some, at present living, who may come to be thus fully and totally redeemed; having another body put on them, that is, one after the priestly order.
"44. This priestly anointed body, will render them impregnable, and qualify them for that high degree of spiritual government, which they are called to.
"45. Wherefore it is required on our part, to suffer the spirit of burning to do upon us the refining work, fanning us with his fiery breath, and searching every part within us, until all be pure and clear, and we thereby arrive to this fixed body, from whence the wonders are to flow out.
"46. This body will be the sealing character of the Philadelphian Church.
"47. Upon this body will be the fixation of the URIM and THUMMIM, that are to be appropriated to the priests of the Melchisedekian order; whose descent is not to be counted in the genealogy of that creation which is under the fall; but in another genealogy which is from the restoration.
"48. Hence these priests will have a deep inward search, and a divine sight into the secret things of the Deity; will be able to prophesy in a clear ground, not darkly and enigmatically, for they will know what is couched in the first originality of all beings, and in the eternal archetype of nature; and so will be capacitated to bring them forth according to the divine council and ordination.

And I saw them have great quantities of victuals round about them, and I was hungry, fainting almost to death, to my thinking, but no man fed me; and I left that number of people, and went on measuring again till I got to a place called Toad-holes, near Okenshaw [sic]; then I met with my mother's father, who had been dead many years, and he said, 'What art thou measuring?' and I said, 'thou knowest.' 'And who is yon number that thou hast been with?' And I said, 'Thou knowest.' And he said, 'I'll tell thee who they are--they are the Gentiles which will become Esau's end, for they'll neither feed thee nor receive thy word.' And he said, 'Dost thou know that thou hast to measure many nations? but the Gentiles thou art not to measure, for it is to be burnt up and destroyed; but thou art sent to measure Israel, and the Lord thy God will make them Israelites after thou hast measured them; and he is with thee. And thou hast been despairing in thy mind, but the Lord will gather a great number by thee, for thou art a brand plucked out of the fire.' This excerpt appears reminiscent of the recurring throne theophany, or prophetic motif, found in Old Testament prophets, as well as in the stories of Lehi and Joseph Smith. The theory suggests that a pattern dictates the manner in which prophets are called to the ministry. Beginning with a historical prologue, which describes the setting of the experience (i.e., time and place), biblical prophets describe seeing a vision of God on a throne after which they are given a book of lamentation and woe and ordered to preach from it. As a result of their preaching, the prophets would typically fall into disfavor with the general public, who would then seek their lives. This same pattern appears in Lehi's call, as well as in the story of Joseph Smith (even though the theory was a subject of scholarly discussion until 1947). See Jeremiah 23:18,22; Isaiah 6:1; 1 Kings 22:19; 1 Nephi 1:4-6, 8, 11, 20; Revelation 4-5; JS-H 1:14; D&C 76:20-21. Also in this passage, Wroe appears to differentiate between the Father and the Son. However, whether or not he maintained belief in the Trinity is not evident [Revelation 4-5, especially 5:7 clearly denote the existence of two personages, yet this does not prevent many from preserving faith in the Trinity].

Excerpt (pages): "Street House, 12th of 11th Month, 1819. About two o'clock in the morning, having been struck blind and dumb, the sun and the moon appeared to me, after that, there appeared a very large piece of glass, and looking through it I saw a very beautiful place, which I entered into; and I saw numbers of persons who were bearing the cross of Christ; and I saw angels ascending and descending; and there came an angel which was my guide.

"There then appeared a great altar, and I looked up and beheld, as it were the Son of God, and angels standing on both sides playing music; and my guide said to me, 'Now thou seest the Father and the Son, and the glory thereof.'"

"Looking round me I saw a large number of people which I could not number.

"After that, the angel, or my guide, said to me, 'Thy prayers have been heard, but not accepted; for thou wert not like Abraham when he offered up his son Isaac for a sacrifice;"
thou hast withholden thine heart back from the Lord thy God, but now thou art cleansed-- Spirit, return to thy rest.'
"... He then took me into a large place, where I saw a great number of books put on the edge, with gilt letters which I could not read; and there appeared a large altar full of gilt letters. I begged that I might read that writing, and understand it; there likewise appeared many more of the same form, which I desired to read also; and there appeared another, whose letters were black print, or old English, and I saw Jeremiah upon the top of it, and an L. I wrote it on the wall with my finger, as I laid in my bed; the people who were observing me, perceived, that I wished to write, not being able to speak, for my tongue was fast in my mouth as before, they gave me a board and chalk into my hands, and I wrote Jeremiah, 50th chapter; my guide turned to me, and said, 'I will tell thee the meaning of this chapter. Thou shalt set up a standard, --conceal not my words, but publish it in the streets; this chapter shall fall upon the land.'
"... I saw the throne of God and the glory thereof; it appeared as a place arched with precious stones, which shone with such lustre, that my eyes could scarce look upon it; there were numbers of angels on each side of the throne, and there was silence in the place for some time. My guide then shewed me the Father and the Son in the midst of it.
There then was the sweetest music I ever heard, which lasted for some time. The whole company which were round the throne sung as with one voice. [once again, Wroe is told to "set up a standard in the open streets; conceal not the things which thou hast heard and seen"]" (3-7)

by Lead.
Comment: This excerpt recounts what the author claimed as her first vision, where she suggests it was made known to her that the Second Coming would be characterized by the birth of the Holy Ghost, rather than the rebirth of Christ. According to Lead, the mother of this child will be "more dignified and honoured" than Mary, the mother of Jesus, although her reasoning for this assertion is not clear. It is interesting to note her description of a bright light around her bed.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson
Excerpt (pages): "December 13, 1676.--In the night, I had a bright shine about my bed; which was signified to me, that as without, so it should be all light, from the seven oily lamps, that should be as a covering flame to clothe the VIRGIN WOMAN, WHO SHOULD BE IMPREGNATED WITH THE BIRTH OF THE MOST HOLY SEED OF GOD. Then queried I, who this woman should be? It was said, the name was known and written in one, that was to be of a perfect heart, meet for high and heavenly converse, and so, thereby contract a sun-shine body of light, chrystaline and clear, to wing unto the heavenly sphere, which is the habitation for spirits of light. This woman, that is certified of by John in the Revelations, has not had its fulfilling prophecy to this day; therefore, yet to come, it was in spirit said to me, The birth of Jesus was great and marvellous, but this shall far excel it, because it will be of such high extracted quality, as no terrestrial can or shall see its God-like form; but as its going forth may be felt and understood by effects, to be indeed THE BIRTH OF THE HOLY GHOST. . . this is a birth of mere spirit, without any commixture of humanity, only it will pass and act, sometimes through this virgin humanity, which it hath chosen to be its birth-womb or temple body, whereby it may act its deeds of wonder answerable to its birth-deity; so that here the mother of the virgin-birth will be more dignified and honoured, than the foregoing ministration in the birth of Jesus was." Comment: This brief excerpt, taken from a revelation Wroe dates April 13, 1824, as recorded by William Tillotson, discusses the role of women in assigning men to their various tribes. Wroe divided his followers into the twelve tribes of Israel, and it appears that women aided him in this task. Although this appears to be a great responsibility, it is lessened somewhat in that women are not named to a tribe as an individual, but rather she must be assigned to whichever tribe her husband belongs to.

Nature of Source: This was an individual pamphlet published in Great Britain, yet later combined with 29 other similar writings in a compilation entitled Divine Revelations and Prophecies. Although the author of this work remains anonymous, it was clearly written by a supporter of John Ward, who later took upon himself the name Zion. The stated purpose of this pamphlet is to refute the argument of the Reverend T.P. Foley, one of the earliest and most loyal disciples of Joanna Southcott. Following the prophetess' death in 1814, many claimed to be Southcott's successor, yet Foley and various others, such as Jane Townley and William Sharp, who together comprised the "Old Guard," rejected them all. One of these claimants was Zion Ward, who declared he was the Shiloh whose coming Southcott had prophesied of. Most likely either he or his followers wrote this pamphlet.

Comment: Although this particular excerpt does not address the use of tobacco, alcohol, etc., as does the Latter-day Saint Word of Wisdom, it is interesting to note that the phrase itself was utilized.

Researcher: Gretchen Olson
Excerpt (pages): "The sun must be risen to judge of your call; and you see the word saith, that 'the Lord giveth the nations before him;' yea, 'as driven stubble to his bow,' and 'dust to his sword.' Now the sword and bow is the word of wisdom, with which strong rod he shall dash the evil nations of man's wisdom to pieces; like the vessel of a potter shall they be broken to pieces." (19)

Publisher: John Wroe, for the Trustees of the People who have Surnamed themselves Israelites
Date of Publication: 1845
Library Location: BYU Stacks BX 67999.C5 W76x 1845 vol.1
Nature of Source: This volume is the first of a three volume collection of John Wroe's visions and revelations that were putatively communicated to him by the Spirit. Due to a relative lack of education, Wroe found it necessary to recruit scribes from among his disciples who could then record his revelations. He was one of the many successors of Joanna Southcott, a self-proclaimed prophetess in early nineteenth century England, and he founded the sect of Christian Israelites, whose stronghold concentrated in the English towns of Bradford and Ashton-under-Lyne. Wroe attempted to transform the latter into a New Jerusalem, although he was forced to leave in 1831 due to sexual misconduct. From then on, he continued to receive and publish revelations and sought disciples elsewhere in Great Britain, as well as in the United States and Australia.
Comment: This passage was taken from a revelation dated January 27, 1824, as recorded by William Tillotson. In the following excerpt, the speaker commands Wroe and his disciples to follow the portion of the Mosaic Law which forbade the eating of non-kosher foods. For the Christian Israelites, the purpose behind this health code was to establish a distinct separation between those who were of the covenant and those who were not. For that reason, they were required to obey the law as soon as they were baptized, "come out of the water." On the other hand, the Mormon Word of Wisdom was "[g]iven for a principle with promise" (D&C 89:3), as the Lord agreed to bestow blessings of spiritual and physical health upon those who abided its guidelines. In addition, the passage seems to imply that the health code will be extended to vegetarianism during the Millennium, when "my cattle shall live as well as them."
Researcher: Gretchen Olson
Excerpt (pages): "And when thou art come out of the water, my children shall remember the laws which I gave unto Moses, they shall eat nothing that dies of itself; they shall eat nothing that has blood within it; and they shall not touch any unclean thing with their hands that is dead; they shall not eat any thing that I commanded my servant Moses that they should not eat; and the things that I ordered by my servant Moses--those they shall eat and live; and then, I tell thee, at that day my cattle shall live as well as them; there shall be no more death on my creation, for I will cause all unclean beasts to pass out of the land, but the clean beasts which I named unto Noah, they shall live for ever.
"And as thou hast eaten thy bread by measure, so shall the Gentiles; and as thou hast eaten and drunken with care and astonishment, so shall the world; but this shall not be so unto my children, for this is the time that my children shall be known that I am separating them." (52-53)

In addition, the speaker notes those who will dwell on Mount Zion are those who are circumcised both literally as well as figuratively (of the heart). Nature of Source: Smith wrote a New Testament Dictionary for the purpose of showing the original meanings of words so he could disavow every un-Christian tradition (as he saw it) that had been imported into Christianity. Smith is a revivalist and an advocate of primitivism.

Comment: In this passage on "Mystery," Smith equates the evil of Babylon with the Catholic Church.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "MYSTERY....It signifies that the wickedness which has of ages past been practices by false teachers, under the name of the religion of Jesus; the church of Rome has been at the head of it, and [of the?] account is called "Mystery Babylon the
This is not a mystery which cannot be understood, though it s not understood by all now; yet it will be revealed" (277).

Nature of Source: This is a collection of pamphlets mostly written by Zion [John Ward], one of the successors to Joanna Southcott.

Comment: A number of similarities exist between Southcottian doctrines (and those of her successors) and Mormonism. Ward favors a purely spiritualized, or allegorical reading of the Bible. Christianity 'of the letter,' which sees the Bible as historical, is mistaken.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "The old and long standing Religion (Christianity in the letter,) must not give way, and submit to the True Light that is now given to the younger; the old covenant is called the elder because it has been a long time set up, and is now in a state of decay, to which the word points in the Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. viii. ver. 13,...." (33)

Topics: bishops, deacons, elders, apostles, prophets, evangelists

Author: Oliver Hart

Title of Book: A Humble Attempt to Repair the Christian Temple
Nature of Source: A sermon concerning "the business of officers and private members in the church of Christ, and how their work should be performed; with some motives to excited professors ardently to engage in it."

Comment: He outlines the structure of the church. Bishops, or ministers should preach, perform ordinances such as baptism and the Lord's supper, governing the church, visiting the sick, comforting the faint, reproofing vice, and refuting errors and heresies (14-23). Deacons should help make sure the table is set up for the Lord's supper, collect money for the minister's support, for the poor, and the church building, etc. It also delineates the duties of common church members.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "In the primitive age of christianity, there were apostles, prophets and evangelists; but these, being extraordinary officers, ceased. And as to lay-elders in the church, commonly called ruling elders, there seems but little, rather no foundation in the word of God for them. With regard to their business, the scripture is silent. And to speak of an officer without an office, is a grand solicism[sic]. Besides, it is a reflection on the wisdom of Christ, to suppose he would appoint an officer in his church, and afford him no instructions relative to his duty. Ministers, or bishops and deacons being then, in my humble opinion, the only officers in a gospel church, I proceed to point out the work they have to do therein" (13-14).

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: True & Rowe
Date of Publication: 1812 (orig. 1785)
Library Location: 080 Sh64a no. 26522

Nature of Source: This pamphlet is an optimistic treatise of American independence. It discusses some of the great progresses, freedoms, and potentials enjoyed by the United States. It warns against debts, oaths of allegiance, and slavery.

Comment: The significant portions of this tract discuss the role of Providence in the outcome of the Revolutionary War. It lauds the freedom of religion, and condemns European state religion in favor of the protestant notion of a spiritual church. The optimism about peace and prosperity is secular, not millennial.

"...it is not impossible but that by some such means universal peace may some time or other be produced, and all war excluded from the world. Why may we not hope to see this begun in America? The articles of confederation make considerable advances towards it" (9).

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: London

Date of Publication: 1975 (originally 1690)
Library Location: B 1290 1975

Nature of Source: Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute, donated by John Gray.
Locke's famous philosophical treatise that aims to prove his thesis that there are no innate ideas, and humans are therefore tabula rasa.

Comment: Various sections deal with the idea of God. Here, Locke accepts two classical Aristotelian/Thomist proofs for the existence of God. He explains the cosmological argument, and the argument from intelligence. The first argument rests on the premise that something cannot come from Nothing. The second that higher beings cannot come from lower beings. Joseph Smith's cosmology undermines both of these principles. All matter is eternal and hence needs no creation and all things are material.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey
Excerpt (pages): "nothing can no more produce any real Being, than it can be equal to two right angels.... If therefore we know real Being, and that Non-entity cannot produce real Being, it is an evident demonstration, that from Eternity there has been something; Since what was not from Eternity, had a Beginning; and what had a Beginning, must be produced by something else" (620).
"If then there must be something eternal, let us see what sort of Being it must be. And to that, it is very obvious to Reason, that it must necessarily be a cogitative Being. For it is as impossible to conceive, that ever bare incogitative Matter should produce a thinking intelligent Being, as that nothing should of it self produce Matter. Let us suppose any parcel of Matter eternal, great or small, we shall find it, in it self, able to produce nothing" (623).

Nature of Source: A sermon delivered by Rev. Hargrove, a Swedenborgian belonging to the New Jerusalem Church. He was a former Methodist, who left the church for doctrinal reasons (15). Interestingly, this sermon is delivered at the "opening the first religious Temple, that has ever been erected in these U. States" (5).

Comment: He argues against the articles of faith of Methodism that God does not have a body.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "I would ask, if the Divine being is divisible, I she not material? if he has NO body, how can he be substantial? and, if he has no PARTS, how can he BE or EXIST, at all? What difference can there be between saying God has NO BODY; and flatly declaring that he is NO-BODY? I cannot split this hair; and therefore, I cannot perceive wherein this doctrine of God's having no body differs from ATHEISM. Surely every christian knows, or ought to know (with St. Paul,) that there are not only bodies terrestrial, but bodies celestial also; and as it is plain there can be nobody without its corresponding essence it must evidently follow, there can be no essence without its corresponding body: Material essences have material bodies; and spiritual essences have spiritual bodies also" (16).

Title of Book: Sketches of Universal History, Sacred and Profane, From the Creation of the World, to the Year 1818 of the Christian Era

Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:
Nature of Source: This is a textbook of world history. It describes Old and New Testament events as history and as such provides insight to what the common views of these events were in the period. Its discussion of American history begins with its settlement and does not discuss Native American origins or customs.

Comment: The discussion of Biblical events is pretty much what can be expected. It gives an account of the miraculous events of the creation and summarizes the major historical developments through the time of Jesus. Joseph Smith is easy to contrast against these textbook concepts of the Bible and history. Compare the preface to the title page of the Book of Mormon.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "To shew that one supreme, omnipotent, eternal God created the universe, that his superintending providence preserves and governs all things; that his wisdom regulates and controls all events, that the smallest as well as the largest are equally the objects of his care...is the great object of this work.... To accomplish this object with the most forcible demonstration, I have shewn the great designs of God in the government of men, by unfolding a succession of the prophesies, by which he announced a grand succession of events, from the fall of man down to this day, and to end of the world. To enforce conviction, I have recorded a narrative of the most important events which have fulfilled these prophecies, in regular succession, from the first promise of God to Adam, down to this day, as they stand recorded by the most approved historians. In this narrative it clearly appears, that all the historians, through all ages of the world, have done no more than record the will and government of God, as predicted by his inspired prophets, hundreds and thousands of years before they were accomplished" (Preface).

Nature of Source: Written by John Ward, one of the leaders to spring up following Joanna Southcott. This pamphlet is contained in a compilation of literature by Southcottians.

Comment: In his denunciation of marriage, Ward argues that it is a human institution and therefore evil. This is indicative of his antinomianism.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "for if God chooses to justify every thing that the world calls sin, if such is the infinity of his grace, how dare a man find fault? Has not God a right to do what he likes with his won grace, and to bestow it where he pleases? What! and does God justify such men as these? Yes, I say he does. Oh, I can't think that, says one, for I believe that when a man is converted he becomes a good an; but, oh, le me tell you, such a one is certainly evil; for I plainly tell you that God justifies those the world calls sinners; and strange as it may seem, it is quite true, that while a man is doing wrong, that then he is doing right.... For instance, you take a Woman to church, and marry her according to the ceremony of the Parson, and imagine that all is well; and then you live together very comfortably, and think yourselves very honest people because this parson has joined you together. Oh yes, to be sure! and your own conceit is, that you are then very amiable and very innocent! for you are married people; but another couple that might take to live together according to God's ordinance, that is, to unite in love and in love only; if the parson does not unite them you (to speak plain) no better than they ought to be, and are living in the most awful sin, in your view; but who gave the parson authority to marry? Has he any authority from God for what he does? No, he has not! It is a system of priestcraft, and not God's ordinance at all! but, instead of being the law of God, it is the law that blinds, made by the spirit that blinds, which is the devil; so that, while you imagine you are walking in God's holy ordinance, you are in reality serving Satan" (16-17).

There was also, a prevailing opinion, that there was money deposited in the bowels of the earth, at Schooler's mountain, with an enchantment upon it-that it could not be obtained without a peculiar art in legerdemain, or to dispel the hobgoblins & apparitions. These gentlemen, in pursuit of a man that could work miracles, accidentally found Rogers, and after a short conversation, made known their business to him, and concluded that the was the man every way calculated to their wishes, for he was very fond of giving hints of his extensive knowledge in every art and science, but careful not to go so far as to demonstrate his propositions. Nature of Source: This local history contains an account of the Wood family, founders of the New Israelites. Discussed as an influence on Mormonism in Brooke, The Refiner's Fire. He attempts to demonstrate the hermetic, and magic connections this group had. Frisbie claims that Winchell had contact with both Oliver Cowdery's father, and Joseph Smith, Sr.

Comment: Nathaniel Wood, after being excommunicated from the Congregationalists for doctrinal disputes, traveled and preached unsuccessfully. He was a millennialist, "the judgments of God were his favorite themes" (45). He called his followers "modern Israelites or Jews" (46). A man named Winchell introduced a hazel rod to the group and the money digging commenced around 1799. He was involved in counterfeiting prior to his arrival.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey
Excerpt (pages): "It was a stick of what has been known as witch hazel—a small bush or shrub very common in this vicinity. T was cut with two prongs, in the form of a fork, and the person using it would teak the two prongs, one in each hand, and the other end from the body. From the use of this stick Winchell and the Woods pretended to divine all sorts of things to suit their purposes. It is probably true that a hazel stick, or perhaps any green stick, cut in this form and held in this manner by some persons, will sometimes move without any apparent cause. There is some natural cause for it. Whether it is attracted by water or mineral substances in the earth, or moved by the imagination of the person holding it, is a matter for the philosopher, not for me" (47).

Comment: The author is very well educated and attempts an even-handed investigation into Indian origins and customs. He has no stated ideological presupposition. He attempts to describe all that he has observed while traveling among the Indians and inquiring about many of their customs. He discusses various theories about the origins of the Indians, and concludes that they are not from the Hebrews or Jews, but rather from the Chinese and other Pacific islands. He takes a great deal of time to dispute the theory of Mr. Adair about the Hebrews. There is a detailed account of their dress, customs of war, familial relations, treatment of women, reckoning of time, and religion. There is nothing in this book which I consider to be a similar description of Book of Mormon peoples and Carver's encounters with Indians, except that he notes that they count distance by a "day's journey" (180-3).

Nature of Source: Written in 1848, this is a novel that is largely autobiographical of Smith's experience with John Wroe, one of the successors to Joanna Southcott.
Comment: There are many similarities between Wroe and Joseph Smith, Wroe having been called a "lesser Joseph Smith." It is highly unlikely that there was any direct contact between the two groups. Their doctrines of God are very similar. The fictional nature of the source may affect the accuracy.
Researcher: Taylor Petrey
Excerpt (pages): "The saints are not yet divinized. They must be made partakers of the divine nature. The sons of God are divine, like their Father. The nature of the younger brethren is identical with that of the elder brothers. The sons of God must be manifested, and they are the great polytheistic unity of which the innumerable Gentile gods and goddesses are merely the types and shadows. We must all become divine-the Elohim, or gods of a regenerated world; and we are all under the curse until our divinity declare itself" (176-7).

Nature of Source: Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute. This history textbook is designed as a general reader for students, "so that the whole may be studied by Periods, or the History of any country may be read by itself" (title page).
Comment: This text is useful for understanding the historiography of the period. The beginning contains a brief account of the earliest origins of man. It divides the races into three categories. Notably, it considers the Native Americans to be descended from the Mongols, or Chinese. The non-literal reading of the Bible is also noteworthy.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "There are different races of our species occupying the various portions of the earth, and distinguished from each other in corporeal structure and in mental development. These numerous varieties are, by the ablest investigators, reduced to three principal stems, viz. the Caucasian or Europeo-Arabic, the Mongol, and the Negro or Ethiopic. The first contains the people of Asia, north and south of the great mountain range of Caucasus and its continuation to the Ganges, or Europe, and of Northern Africa; the second, the people of Easter Asia and of America; the third, the tribes with woolly hair and sable skin that people the African continent. Yet many tribes can with difficulty be brought under any one of these divisions: the endless variety of Nature is as apparent in the human race as in the animal and vegetable kingdoms.... The general opinion, founded on the literal interpretation of Scripture, has long been, that at the time of the flood all mankind perished, save Noah and his family. Some, however, contend, that the words of the inspired writer are not to be taken so strictly, and that as his information was destined for a particular potion of mankind, it may have been only intended to instruct them in the history of the race to which they belonged, while that of other races may have been passed over in silence. Hence they would infer that we are not precluded by the Mosaic writings from supposing, that at the time of the great inundation other portions of mankind may have saved themselves in different manners and places. They therefore look to the higher regions of the earth, and find three elevated ranges in the neighborhood of the tree distinct stems into which we find mankind divided. The lofty range extending from the Black Sea to the east of India has been at all times regarded as being either itself or the lands south of it, the original seat of the Caucasian race. Stile more east, beyond Tibet and beyond the desert of Cobi, rises another range, regarded as the original seat of the Mongol race which dwells around it: and the Mountains of the Moon and their branches are thought to point out the primitive abodes of the Negro race. America, it is probable, was not, till long after, adapted for the abode of man.... It is to the Caucasian race that the history of the world must mainly confine itself, for with that races has originated almost all that ennobles and dignifies mankind: it is the chief depository of literature, and the great instructor of philosophical, political, and religious systems" (15-17).

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Buffaloe, VA
Publisher: Campbell and Sala
Date of Publication: 1824
Library Location: Rare Non-Circ. 286.6 c

Nature of Source: A debate between Campbell and Rev. W. L. Maccalla. Sidney Rigdon, who is acknowledged in the preface, took notes for the debate.
Comment: This debate is quite lengthy, but a good source for the major arguments on the debate of infant baptism via "sprinkling" versus adult baptism by immersion. This is a great source also for understanding the culture of religious debates. The arguments rely primarily on history accounts and proof texts from the Bible. A major issue is the relationship between circumcision and the new law and baptism. The word "seal" is used in referring to the ordinance of baptism.
Researcher: Taylor Petrey
Excerpt (pages): "I have also read the practice of the original witnesses in Judea, Samaria, and the Uttermost parts of the earth; which clearly shows in what manner they understood the law of baptism, which law authorizes the baptism of disciples only" (72). "Does baptism represent, seal and apply any thing to an infant?" (26).

Title of Article: Title of Periodical: Place of Publication: Chalestown
Publisher: Samuel Etheridge
Date of Publication: 1802
Library Location: Rare. 366.4 P297p 1802

Nature of Source: This book examines the history of "Illuminism," an order of Masonry. It is intended as an exposé of the intentions of the sect's political and religious teachings. He traces its origins to the atheism of Voltaire and other figures representing the Age of Reason, and the growth of the corrupted forms of Masonry in France and Germany, and demonstrates its existence in the United States.
Comment: The author explains that the true goals of Illuminism are to undermine Christianity and established forms of government. It fits into the general stream of anti-Masonic literature from the period, though it defends more orthodox forms of Masonry. Significant differences between his depiction of Illuminism and the Gadianton robbers exist. First, there is no emphasis on the ultimate goal of this order being material gain.
Second, the means used by this order are literature and false philosophy. In short, it is an army of principles, not soldiers (p 248).

Nature of Source: This section is an account of "Joe Smith, The Mormon Prophet" and the time he spent in Harmony. It contains personal testimonies of people that were familiar with him while in Pennsylvania, and especially concentrates on his 'peeping.' It contains a copy of a letter from Isaac Hale written to an Ohio newspaper, March 20, 1834. This contains an account of early money-digging, the marriage to Emma, and the translation of the Book of Mormon.

Comment: This well known report has a section that discusses the "green stone, with brown, irregular spots on it....a little longer than a gooses egg, and about the same thickness," said to be purchased by Joseph Smith from Jack Belcher. The stone is reported to have been very successful for Belcher before he sold it to Smith, who then used it to make money. The rest of the testimonies aim to discredit Smith as deceiver.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "Smith early put on the airs of a prophet, and was in the habit of 'blessing' his neighbors' crops for a small consideration. On one occasion a neighbor had a piece of corn plated rather late, and on a moist piece of ground, and, feeling a little doubtful about its ripening, got Smith to bless it. It happened that that was the only piece of corn killed by the frost in the neighborhood. When the prophet's attention was called to the matter, he got out of the difficulty by saying that he made a mistake, and put a curse on the corn instead of a blessing. Rather an unneighborly act, and paid for too!" (580).

Nature of Source: A sermon preached at the opening of Trinity-Church in Pomfret. The sermon served as "A Dedication Sermon."
Comment: The speaker readily analogizes the Temple to the physical church that they are in. He never calls the Church a temple, but does call it a "House of God." The Churches enjoy all the same benefits in terms of the presence of God as did the Jewish Temple.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "And although the workmanship and ornamental glory of the house, in which we are now assembled, are incomparably beneath those of Solomon's Temple; yet the words under consideration, may be as properly used at the dedication of this House, as they were at the consecration of that Temple. For the presence of God is as necessary in this Sanctuary, as in that of Solomon: You [sic] really need God's favourable attention to your prayers offered in this Church, as the Israelites did in their Temple" (1-2).

"This text is one remarkable instance of the religious custom among God's people, in former ages, of setting apart, and dedicating Houses to the solemn worship of their maker. This custom, among the Jews, was under the direction and approbation of God: And performed by Solomon, with the immediate assistance of the divine spirit. And this has been almost the universal custom of Christians, ever since they have been suffered to erect decent houses of worship" (3-4).

"That the House of God should be at least commodious, decent, clean, and comely, is what we might reasonably expect every one would approve of, who pretends to any reverence for God or religion" (14).

Comment: This section is incredibly insightful into popular protestant ideas about the Temple. Notions of the "invisible church" are present as a subtext for Smith's denunciation of the Temple in post-New Testament times.

The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands, Acts 7. 48. Laying cornerstone, and dedicating such buildings, is the work of idolators. The Persians who worshipped the sun would not have a temple to confine his influence, and men must be more stupid than the Persians to think the Creator dwells in such idolatrous buildings erected by speculating priests as warehouses, where they make merchandise of the people. If our bodies are not temples of the Holy Ghost, all other temples will be of no avail in the sight of God" (354-5).

Nature of Source: This tract written by the famous Cotton Mather is based on 1 Cor 3:16, "know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" He draws upon ancient writers such as Josephus and Vitruvius.

Comment: This illustrates a common Christian usage of the term "temple". Only the "good man" is a temple. It also speaks of "Temple-Work," which is the process of becoming a temple.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey

Excerpt (pages): "It is then a thing to be Known and Own'd among us, That every Servant of God is a Temple of God! Indeed the whole Church of God collectively taken is a Temple which our most Magnificent Solomon is Building for Him. The Building is not yet Finished; The Period which answers to the Seventh Year wherein the Temple of Solomon was Finished, is not yet arrived. When any of the Elected are Converted unto God, that Illustrious Temple is therein Edified; A New Stone is laid in the Building, which being fitly Framed, grows up into an Holy Temple.... When that brave Man, the Emperour Justinian, had built for our Lord JESUS CHRIST a Matchless Temple, at Constantinople, the view which he took of the Exquisite Work, at the Dedication of it, made him cry out with Rapture, O Solomon, I have out-done thee! My Temple is greater than thine, O Solomon! With infinitely more of Reason will our Lord JESUS CHRIST say this upon His Church; All the Angels in Heaven will one day join in the Acclamations: And Solomon himself being present, will consent unto them; Here; Here is a Temple, that infinitely out-does thine, O Solomon! ... "The immensity of the Divine Essence, and the most radiant excellency of God’s glorious Majesty, which no creature can behold in its full purity and live; cannot be contained and immured within (a) Temples made with hands. Wherefore it is observable that holy John relates that he saw (b) no Temple in the new and heavenly Jerusalem, that is above: For the LORD GOD Almighty and the Lamb, are the Temple of it. Yet it was his own good and holy pleasure, that (c) Solomon should build him an House, wherein as to his manifestative presence, he was resolved to dwell more especially among the Children of Israel, his chosen people. In these Gospel-dayes (under which we live through divine goodness) when the worship of God is farre more spiritual, though his Majesty hath no appointed a peculiar City, wherein to place his name: yet it is not unlawful even in these times (but very commendable and useful) to erect material Temples, wherein the solemnities of Gospel-Ordinances may be celebrated, and the congregations of his faithful people may more commodiously meet together" (206-7). The New York Commercial Advertiser contains a letter from a gentleman traveling in Canada, in which we find the following account of a singular sect of people called Davidites, or the Children of Peace, who are located about 36 miles from York. Their founder and present leader is David Wilson. He was formerly a member of the society of friends, as were many of his followers. They emigrated from the state of Pennsylvania, about 25 years ago, and they have now a society of from 180 to 200. They reside in families and close to each other, forming a community something like the Shakers. Although called Children of Peace, David has fifty of them completely armed, and I understand a part of their worship consists of military display. They have recently commenced the building of a Temple, which like that of Solomon, is to be seven years in building. The frame is 60 feet square, and was prepared at a distance and was brought and put together without the sound of a hammer or an axe being heard. It is to be ornamented within and without, and although it will be costly, yet the treasury of David will not admit of the splendor which was displayed by Solomon. The building is to be three stories high, with a steeple; from the base to the top of the first story is 70 feet, and when that was completed, twenty four females ascended and sung an evening anthem just as the sun was sinking in the west. They have a small place of worship, in which there is a good organ-They go in procession to their places of worship, the females taking the lead, being preceded by banners, and two of their number playing on the lute,...I have not been able to ascertain what are their peculiar doctrines" Clarke's scholarly commentary contains the full text of the Bible with cross-references and lengthy notes and verse-by-verse commentary. Vol. 5 and 6 are also known as New Testament vol. 1 and 2.

Comment: In Clarke's commentary on the Temple in Acts, he sees no purpose for Christians to attend the temple except for non-religious purposes.

Researcher: Taylor Petrey
Excerpt (pages): Acts 2:46 "Verse 46....They were present at all the times of public worship, and joined together in prayers and praises to God; for it is not to be supposed that they continued to offer any of the sacrifices prescribed by the law" (5:701).
Acts 21:26 "Besides their typical and religious use, sacrifices were also intended for the support of the state and civil government.... On these principles we are able to account for Paul's sacrificing.... after it was abrogated by Christ, but his offering these typical sacrifices, after the antitype of them was accomplished in the sacrifice of Christ, was a virtual denial of Christ, and of the virtue of his sacrifice, which superseded all others. Paul's long trouble, which began immediately after this affair, some have looked upon as a judgment of God upon him for this great offence.... we are to consider that there was a political as well as a typical use of sacrifices of Christ, yet the political continued till God in his providence broke up the Jewish state and polity about forty years after our Saviour's death.... Now, of this kind was the sacrifice which Paul offered; and in this view they were paid by Christians dwelling in Judea, as well as by those who still adhered to the Jewish religion" (5:861).

Nature of Source: This article contains an account of the Woods family, called a "Fraternity of Rodsmen." Frisbie, History of Middletown, Vermont, claims that Oliver Cowdery's father and Joseph Smith, Sr. had been involved.

Comment: Nathaniel Wood, after being excommunicated from the Congregationalists for doctrinal disputes, traveled and preached unsuccessfully. He was a millennialist, "the judgments of God were his favorite themes" (See also, , 45). He called his followers "descendents of the ancient Jews". The expected destruction of the wicked was understood as a Passover (Frisbie, 53). A man named Winchell introduced a hazel rod to the group and the money digging commenced around 1799. He was involved in counterfeiting prior to his arrival.

Referencing the temple they began to construct, "the frame of a large building was put up, (which is now in use as a barn;)."

"Their claims to being descendants of the ancient Jews, and lawful inheritors of the whole country, they declared were soon to be established by the hand of Omnipotence. Excerpt (pages): "This, perhaps, will appear strange to some to say that Adam did not commit sin when he disobeyed God; by he did not, but did the will of God is so doing, as you may plainly read at the bottom of page 44, of "The answer of the Lord to the powers of darkness," which reads as follows:--"You will observe that if Satan had never tempted man to fall, man would still be liable to his temptations, whenever he chose to begin during the 6000 years; therefore, infinite wisdom permitted the fall, and secured man from eternal ruin, by preserving the tree of life from his reach until the fullness of time came, when man is again restored to the image and likeness of his maker-secured from the power of Satan who will be so bound and chained as to have no access to deceive an any more. Then may he take of the tree of life and live." Can this all-wise and merciful plan originate in the brain of a simple woman, (Zion) or in any wisdom of man, either natural or acquired? So you see the fall was permitted, nay more, I say the fall was planned and decreed to take place as much as was the redemption-for if there had been no fall, there could be no redemption from the fall" (18).

The Father is one, the Son is one, the Holy Ghost is one. But because there is in this text mention made but of two of the three, therefore a word about these two. So saying, he took out of a drawer two pieces of solid rock crystal, one shaped like an egg and the other like an orange—that is, one was of an oval, the other of a spherical form. 'These,' said Benbow, 'are the Urim and Thummim of the Jews—at least, they resemble them, as I believe....' The seeress then, holding her crystal egg between her finger and thumb, began to peep." reflections; especially concerning salvation by grace; debates with Unitarians and Arminians; and a personal and family history. The final chapter is less personal and gives advice to those who wish to enter the ministry, and discusses the growth of the Baptist church from 50,000 in 1785 to 400,000 in 1832 becoming the largest Protestant sect after the Methodists in the United States.

Comment: One of the most interesting sections of Peak's memoir is the account of a vision he receives at a time of great personal theological confusion. In his youth, he had been consumed by guilt for his sins. He was having trouble accepting the idea of salvation by grace as he discussed the problem with several ministers during his young adult life. After one such conversation, he is left with the realization that only God can save him. Similarities between Joseph Smith's first vision include a period of doubt followed by vision and a claim of great clarity of understanding following the event. Dissimilarities include the fact that Peak does not pray to receive this knowledge, (and in fact prays for the first time on the following day), the content of the vision is different, he receives no communication from the vision, and most importantly the question he ask is unrelated in nature. Peak is primarily concerned with his own salvation from sin.

Excerpt (pages): "With such views and feelings, on the 6th of August, 1785, I went into the field to perform an hours [sic] work alone. Here I had such views and manifestations as I have never been able to describe. My mind seemed suddenly illuminated, and I was led to contemplate the holiness, love, goodness, and wisdom of GOD, displayed in the wonderful plan of salvation, in a light I had never viewed it before. I had considered the subject in detached parts; but now my mind was led to contemplate the great plan of GOD'S everlasting love, as one uniform consistent whole. The Lord JESUS CHRIST appeared as a Lamb slain, in the divine purpose, from the foundation of the world; set up from everlasting, as the glorious Mediator between GOD and man. In him I beheld the majesty and glory of the divine attributes, to meet in perfect harmony, and shine forth in the most illustrious manner; full of grace and truth, and able to save, to the uttermost, all that come to GOD by him. In the covenant of redemption, a kingdom, or church, was made sure to him, to be gathered out of the apostate world. When upon earth, he appeared IMMANULE, GOD with us. The tokens of divine majesty, attended him through life. In a word, he appeared to me one with the Father, equal in glory and power, and altogether lovely. In my imagination, I beheld glorified saints and angels casting their crowns before him, in humble prostration, adoring and worshiping the eternal SON OF GOD, while all heaven resounded his praise. Several passages in holy writ were brought to my recollection.... My mind was so absorbed in the subject, as I stood by a tree, that I seemed to think of nothing else" (27-28).

Comment: Handsome Lake was a Seneca prophet a generation before Joseph Smith, Jr. The Code and the introduction contain no explicit references to Joseph Smith or his teachings, but a comparative study of myths, rituals, and doctrines could be fruitful. Handsome Lake receives a vision in which three messengers appear to him and explain to him sacred truths. As a prophet, he made the distinction between what he did as a man and what he did as a prophet under the direction of the four messengers. He instructs his followers to stop drinking alcohol. Comparisons can be made to the Three Nephites, but the visitors identify themselves as "they whom he created when he made the world and our duty is to watch over and care for mankind. Now there are four of us, but the fourth is not present" (25).

"LOOK WELL TO THE WEST!"
Anti-Mormon Rhetoric and Nineteenth Century Views of the American West
Benjamin C. Pykles

On the first page of the first chapter of his 1842 book, The History of the Saints: or, An Exposé of Joe Smith and Mormonism, John C. Bennett affirmed that the Mormon "leaders had formed, and were preparing to execute, a daring and colossal scheme of rebellion and usurpation throughout the North-Western States of the Union." It was evident to him "that temporal, as well as spiritual, empire was the aim and expectation of the Prophet and his cabinet." Thus, "to do what the safety of the west demanded," he planned to "expose the imposter." He promised to reveal documents that would "clearly show the existence of a vast and deep laid scheme...for conquering the states of Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, and of erecting upon the ruin of their present governments a despotic military and religious empire." While these "North-Western" states were to form "the NUCLEUS of the great MORMON EMPIRE," the remaining states "were to be licked up like salt, and fall into the immense labyrinth of glorious prophetic dominion."

"[T]he public weal," Bennett concludes, "requires the vigilant eye of the body politic to LOOK WELL TO THE WEST!"¹

Also published in 1842, Jonathon Baldwin Turner's book, Mormonism in all Ages: or the Rise, Progress, and Causes of Mormonism..., made a similar accusation. The Mormons, he asserted, "are in truth the most dangerous and virulent enemies to our political and religious purity, and our social and civil peace, that now exist in the Union."² Turner was a professor and co-founder of Illinois College in Jacksonville, an institution established to help spread the merits of civilization in the West.³ Inimical to this mission was the "silly credulity" on which Mormonism and other similar delusions were founded. Thus, "The folly of Mormonism and the Mormons, and the turpitude of their leaders, are the principle themes..." of his 1842 book. He describes the Mormon populace as being a generally ignorant, simple, honest, industrious, and deluded people. According to Turner, however, the Mormon leaders "are NOT deluded." He contends that "They know perfectly well the full scope of their own perfidious aims; which, absurd as they may seem to some, are neither more nor less than a religious monarchy in these free states, of which they themselves are to be the centres and the demigods." Finally, he, like Bennett, issues a foreboding warning: "Mormonism, if suffered to spread extensively, and unite with Atheism and Romanism, its natural allies, will soon have power to disturb, not single states only, but the entire Union."⁴

The following year, 1843, saw the publication of Frederick Marryat's novel Monsieur Violet: His Travels and Adventures among the Snake Indians, which echoes Bennett's and Turner's concern over a supposed Mormon empire. The novel alleges to be the story of a young French nobleman and his encounters with plains Indians. Towards the end of the book, the young adventurer encounters the Mormons in Nauvoo. An antagonistic version of Mormon history, replete with descriptions of a secret Danite society and a fortified Nauvoo, comprises most of this section of the novel. The Mormons themselves are described as "warlike fanatics" who intend to "annihilate all other sects" but their own. Considering this situation, the Frenchman reasons that "we may therefore, see the time when this gathering host of religious fanatics will make this country shake to its centre." Finally, with great confidence the monsieur declares, "A western empire is certain."⁵

The anxiety over a Western Mormon empire expressed by Bennett, Turner, and Marryat reflects a larger concern in the minds of the American people at this time. The vast unexplored region of western North America had for many years been a subject of interest and concern for both Americans, and the British before them. However, when Jefferson finalized the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, doubling the size of the United States and extending its western boundary from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains, the American West and all of the hopes, dreams, and fears associated with it came to the forefront of American consciousness. However, there was no single accepted image of the American West during the nineteenth century. On the contrary, the region was viewed rather ambivalently at this time. This overall ambivalence gave rise to a variety of different and sometimes contradictory conceptions of the purpose and function of the vast area beyond the frontier. A comprehension of these varied and ambivalent views helps us understand why a Mormon presence in the West was so greatly feared.

A_Safety_Valve A Safety Valve

In 1837, when Horace Greeley made his now famous charge, "Go West, young man, go forth into the country," he was expressing a view of the American West that had been popular since the seventeenth century, and remained so until the turn of the twentieth century when Frederick Jackson Turner declared the western frontier closed.⁶ Greeley's admonition stems from a philosophy in which the American West was viewed as a safety valve for the nation. At its most extreme, the safety valve theory viewed the West as a place to which the poor, oppressed, and unruly could retreat in order to escape their plight, find refuge, and begin anew. In this way, the vast open lands beyond the frontier were believed to be a natural means by which economic and social conflict could be suppressed.⁷ This view was aptly expressed by James Flint in 1826 when he wrote that the West "is an interesting country, as it will long continue to offer a wide field for the emigrating and enterprising population of the older states, and as the great receptacle of the shoals of foreigners, good and bad, that yearly cross the seas to seek, under the tutelar genius of American liberty, an asylum from the oppression, the poverty, or the justice of their native country."

The reaction of many non-Mormons to the plight of the Latter-day Saints is best understood in light of the safety valve thesis. That is, many individuals encouraged the Saints to go west believing that only there would they find the refuge they sought. Such was certainly the belief behind Henry Clay's response to Joseph Smith in 1844, when he wrote that the Saints "had better go to Oregon for redress."
A similar attitude was behind the suggestions of Stephen A. Douglas and other members of a delegation from Carthage, which came to Nauvoo on 1 October 1845 and recommended the Saints remove to Vancouver's Island or the Oregon Territory.
Finally, on 8 April 1845, Thomas Ford, Governor of Illinois, wrote to Brigham Young suggesting the Saints "move to some far distant country" where "you can get off by yourselves...[and] enjoy peace."
In the minds of all of these men, the West, functioning as the nation's safety valve, was an obvious solution to Mormon problem. By encouraging the Mormons to go west, they were ridding themselves and the nation of the Mormon menace, while at the same time advocating the Saints' desire for refuge and peace.

Not all Americans, however, supported the safety valve thesis. On the contrary, many viewed it with alarm. Even though the vast tracts of western land offered a viable solution to the problems posed by undesirable groups like the Mormons, many feared the inadvertent effects that such a policy would bring. The fear that the western territory would fill up with a dangerous population was real indeed. Lyman Beecher, a famous Presbyterian preacher and virulent anti-Catholic, expressed this fear in 1835. Believing that "the religious and political destiny of our nation is to be decided in the West," while at the same time noting how "the West is filling up as by ocean waves," Beecher expresses grave concern over the future of this new western population. "There is no danger," he asserts, "that our agriculture and arts will not prosper: the danger is, that our intelligence and virtue will falter and fall back into a dark minded, vicious populace-a poor, uneducated reckless mass of infuriated animalism, to rush on resistless as the tornado, or to burn as if set on fire of hell."

The Reverend Timothy Dwight saw a reality in Beecher's proposed danger. In reference to those individuals who emigrate westward, he opined, "These men cannot live in regular society. They are too idle; too talkative; too passionate; too prodigal; and too shiftless...[and] are impatient of the restraints of law, religion, and morality." Consequently, "they become at length discouraged: and under the pressure of poverty, the fear of gaol, and the consciousness of public contempt, leave their native places, and betake themselves to the wilderness." Thus, according to Dwight, the detestable character of the western populace is presupposed by their very flight from civilized society.

At precisely the same time the Latter-day Saints were approaching their western destination in the Great Basin, Horace Bushnell, champion of the Home Missionary Society, was promulgating this same anxious image of the western people. His speech, "Barbarism the First Danger," revolves around his self-styled question: "How far [does] emigration and a continual re-settlement, as in this country, involve...a tendency to moral and social disorganization? He finds the answer to this question in observations of the western populace, including the Mormons. Given that ignorance breeds superstition, and the fact that vast amounts of ignorance already prevail among the western people, Bushnell desires "no other proof that superstition has already a wide and terrible sway over the western mind." However, he continues, "if I suffer a doubt, the great Mormon city and temple rise as proof visible before me-proof, however, that does not accrue against the West alone, save that it shows how all fantastic errors and absurdities will assuredly congregate there." Thus, even when Governor Ford, Judge Douglas, and Senator Clay were encouraging the mass emigration of the Saints to a western country, others were anxiously opposing such a move for fear that a lawless, immoral, and uneducated western population would prove detrimental to the destined future of the nation. Robert Southey captured this sentiment well when he wrote, "Were there another Mohammed to arise, there is no part of the world where he would find more scope, or fairer opportunity, than in that part of the Anglo-American Union into which the Elder States continually discharge the restless part of their population, leaving the law and the gospel to overtake it if they can."

_A Garden_

Another popular view of the American West that, according to one scholar, "became one of the dominant symbols of nineteenth-century American society," visualized the West as a garden, an Eden-like agricultural paradise. Indeed, the region was described as being "the largest territory, and most beneficial in climate, and soil, and mineral wealth, and commercial facilities, ever prepared for the habitation of man, and qualified to sustain in prosperity and happiness the densest population on the globe." The garden image received widespread circulation through mediums such as John C. Frémont's report of his western explorations, in which he wrote, "The valley of the Platte looked like a garden; so rich was the verdure of the grasses, and so luxuriant the bloom of abundant flowers." Fictional writings also helped disseminate this view of the West. Washington Irving in his _A tour of the prairies_ described the land as "...a beautiful champaign country, of flowery plains and sloping uplands, diversified by groves and clumps of trees, and long screens of woodland; the whole wearing the aspect of complete, and even ornamental cultivation...." Finally, artists like George Catlin and Karl Bodmer helped perpetuate this view with their artistic renderings of the garden-like West.

Mormon diarists also seemed to substantiate this view of the West. While traversing the plains on his way to the Great Basin, Mormon pioneer Norton Jacob recorded in his journal that "this is the most delightful country of undulating prairie and the slopes crowned with the richest kind of grass...this country is so beautifully adapted to cultivation that there is driven from the mind all idea of its being a waste in the wilderness." The actual valley of the Great Salt Lake was also described as a garden-like paradise. Wilford Woodruff, who viewed the valley for the first time on 24 July 1847, recorded in his journal for that day, "We gazed with wonder and admiration upon the most fertile valley spread out before us...clothed with a heavy garment of vegetation and in the midst of which glistened the waters of the Great Salt Lake, with mountains all around towering to the skies, and streams, rivulets, and creeks of pure water running through the beautiful valley." Both Mormons and non-Mormons, then, viewed the vast western expanse as a garden-like paradise.
Attached to the garden image of the American West was the myth of the yeoman farmer. Western historian Henry Nash Smith has noted that "The master symbol of the garden embraced a cluster of metaphors expressing fecundity, growth, increase, and blissful labor in the earth, all centering around the heroic figure of the idealized frontier farmer armed with that supreme agrarian weapon, the sacred plow." This mythical yeoman farmer represented everything moral, virtuous, orderly, and civilized. He was the imagined product of an agrarian theory based on a policy of free-soil expansion, which claimed that anyone could have free land and cultivate it for himself. The theory maintained that as the farmer cultivated the rich, fertile soils of the garden-like West, his work would cultivate in him those Republican virtues upon which the nation was founded. In this sense, then, the garden of the West was a source of strength, truth, and virtue. In other words, there was an inherent goodness in the West.

The notion that the garden-like West possessed some inherent goodness, however, was not easily reconciled with the fact that the Mormons and similar ignoble groups were apparently prospering within its boundaries. Thus, the seeming success of the Mormons created ambivalence in the minds of some regarding the nature of the West. Surely others must have amazed along with Horace Bushnell when he queried, "Who could have thought it possible that...the Mormons, could gather in its thousands of disciples...build a populous city and erect a temple rivalling [sic] in grandeur even that of the false prophet at Mecca?" How was their presence in the inherently good West to be explained? In their analysis of anti-Mormon novels, Leonard Arrington and Jon Haupt identified one way this ambivalence was reconciled by writers of nineteenth-century anti-Mormon fiction. They argue that the Mormons' presence in the West "was immediately added to the growing list of Mormon crimes against man and nature." This approach allowed the writers to preserve the inherent goodness of the West by attributing the Mormons' presence to their criminal behavior and not to any fault or weakness of the area.

This criminal Mormon presence in the virtuous West is depicted well in the novel Boadecia, The Mormon Wife: Life-Scenes in Utah, ostensibly written by Alfreda Eva Bell. The novel commences with a gardenesque description of the Salt Lake Valley. "There is a lovely valley," the narration begins, "situated midway between the States of the great Mississippi and the shores of the Pacific Ocean. To this terrestrial Paradise, its present inhabitants, the Mormons, have given the name of Deseret...a word of mystic import, signifying 'The Land of the Honey-Bee.'" These first lines, however, may be somewhat deceiving, as the novel quickly becomes an awful tale of death, corruption, and deceit at the hands of Mormon "blacklegs, murderers, forgers, swindlers, gamblers, thieves, and adulterers." The incompatibility of the paradisiacal setting and the Mormon presence therein leads the central female character, Boadicea, to exclaim, "This country is a second Garden of Eden; yet...the thought that it is profaned by a community of wives and husbands, is to me loathsome, frightful!" The Mormons, then, had literally polluted the Western Garden. Their "profaned" community had muted the inherent goodness of the West, leaving Boadicea to disturbingly report, "In spite of all that surrounds me, something innate within me revolts against this state of things."

Others simply could not reconcile the barbarity of the Mormons with the supposed intrinsic goodness of the garden-like West. Such is the case with Metta Victoria Fuller's novel, Mormon Wives: A Narrative of Facts Stranger Than Fiction. With regard to this anti-Mormon novel, Arrington and Haupt acutely observe that
"Despite surface appearances, it is, in fact, a novel about the position of the West with respects to the hopes and aspirations of the self-righteous sons and daughters of New England.29 One of several things the novel reveals about nineteenth-century attitudes and conceptions is that "while many New Englanders were inclined to have a very special feeling toward the West, to regard it as a Garden of Eden, it was, in 'reality,' a region of chaos and barbarity—a wastebasket of the world, with a mask of religion but quite uncivilized."30 Thus, the absolute boorishness of the Mormon people inaugurated a fundamental shift in the way some individuals viewed the West. For some, the West could simply not be the paradisiacal garden it was claimed to be if the Mormons were there and part of it.

A Desert

In direct opposition to the myth of the Western Garden was the view in which the West was imagined as a "Great Desert."31 One traveler, on his way to Oregon in 1839, exemplified this view when he described the western plains as "a burnt and arid desert, whose solemn silence is seldom broken by tread of any other animal than the wolf or the starved and thirsty horse which bares the traveler across its wastes."32 Zebulon Pike, who published a journal of his expedition across the western country in 1810, was the first to express this particular view of the West.33 However, it was the publication of Stephen H. Long's expedition to the Rocky Mountains in 1823 that riveted the idea of a western desert in the minds of the American public. The paintings of Samuel Seymore, the official artist of the expedition, provided visual support for the desert theme.34 Furthermore, contemporary maps that labeled the region "Sandy Plain" or "Great Sand Plain" perpetuated the desert image.35 Finally, writers of fiction further popularized the image describing the "vast uninhabitable solitude" of the great western desert in their novels.36

Given the widespread popularity of the desert image, it is not surprising that the Latter-day Saints were also exposed to its influence. Indeed, during his April 1844 trip to Washington D.C., Orson Hyde learned that "There is some good country in Oregon, but a great deal of sandy barren desert."37 This and other information he acquired during his trip led Hyde to conclude that "Oregon is a good way off, and is not a very good country when you get there."38 Clearly, then, the desert image was one of many factors that influenced the Mormons in their plans to go west. Moreover, although for many Mormon pioneers the initial impressions of the Salt Lake Valley were romantically garden-like, several years of drought, frost, and crickets served to temper their views. Indeed, the harsh reality of life in the Great Basin motivated Brigham Young to say, on the tenth anniversary of their entrance to the valley, "I am thankful to a fulness [sic] that the Lord has brought us to these barren valleys, to these sterile mountains, to this desolate waste, where only the Saints can or would live, to a region that is not desired by another class of people on earth."39

Non-Mormons would have thoroughly agreed with Brigham Young in stating that the desert West could, or would, only be occupied by a certain class of people. However, in their minds this class of people was certainly not saintly. On the contrary, it was believed that only an uncivilized, immoral, and superstitious people would live in such a wasteland. Consider, for example, the scenario described by Washington Irving. In the desert, he wrote, "may spring up new and mongrel races, like new formations in geology, the amalgamation of the 'debris' and 'abrasions' of former races, civilized and savage; the remains of broken and almost extinguished tribes; the descendants of wandering hunters and trappers; of fugitives from the Spanish and American frontiers; of adventurers and desperados of every class and country....

James De Bow, in reference to eastern Oregon, expressed a similar philosophy. He wrote of this "barren wilderness" that "Lawless men...will find refuge here....Brigands and robber chieftains may grow up into power, and co-operating with the savage man, revengeful from long oppression, carry out dismay and death before them."

With conceptions such as these, it is easy to see why some were anxious about the Mormons' removal to the desert West. Indeed, the very plot rehearsed by De Bow, in which lawless fanatics teamed up with Native Americans to wreak havoc on surrounding populations, was already a perceived threat of the Mormon population beginning in Missouri. Furthermore, Mormon dissenters like Oliver Olney helped promulgate this fear. In July 1842, Olney wrote to a friend regarding his concerns with the Mormons' plans to go west. "If they was to [go to] the Rocky Mountains as they are there desired to go[,] What would be the consequence if they should there form a home[?] I will reason some little know of their plans[.] A few first will start and go out by degrees until all will follow that has in their faith[.] They will there form a union as is directed by a few[.] Other[s] move in until they become a powerful people[.] They will unite with the Indians as this has long been the theme by them of the leaders of the Church[.]"

Therefore, for many nineteenth-century observers, only a population as treacherous as the arid, barren land of the western desert could conceivably inhabit the sterile region. The Mormon presence in the West was merely evidence of this fact. If the desert was frightful because of its apparent lack of life sustaining resources, it was as equally fearful because of those "mongrel races" that marauded through it.

_There was yet another reason, however, why the Mormon presence in the West was feared. To understand it, one must look beyond the American West to the shores of Asia. Trade with the Orient had for centuries been a major source of wealth and, hence, power for the competing nations of the world. Whoever controlled this trade, it was thought, had a greater probability of rising to world power. Indeed, it was the desire to find a western route to the markets of the East that spawned Columbus' voyage in the late fifteenth century. The prospects of a western passage to India was also a part of Thomas Jefferson's motivation for sponsoring the Lewis and Clark Expedition three centuries later. When Lewis and Clark actually reached the Pacific in 1804, the notion that the American West was literally a passage to India suddenly became a reality in the minds of many Americans. One historian has noted that "So rich and compelling was the notion that it remained for decades one of the ruling conceptions of American thought about the West."_

_Thomas Hart Benton, Senator of Missouri, was one of the most vocal proponents of this view of the West. He firmly believed the western territory was crucial to the United States' future as a world power. On one occasion he wrote that the network of western rivers linking the American interior with the shores of the Pacific would become for the people of the United States "what the Euphrates, the Oxus, the Phasis, and the Cyrus were to the ancient Romans, lines of communication with eastern Asia, and channels for that rich commerce, which for forty centuries, has created so much wealth and power wherever it has flowed."_
Given this popular conception of the West, it is easy to see why the Latter-day Saints' role in the westward movement was seen ambivalently. On the one hand, the Saints could further prove that such a westward passage was possible. During the five years before the Mormon exodus at least four other major emigrant companies made similar overland journeys. Although, in reality, the Latter-day Saints ended their journey in the Great Basin, their subsequent colonization efforts extended to California, proving not only that travel to the Pacific was possible, but also, and perhaps more importantly, that veritable settlements could be made along the way.

On the other hand, however, the Mormons' aspirations in the West were possibly seen as a potential impediment to such a passage. Indeed, if John C. Bennett's claims of a mid-western Mormon empire were taken seriously, then the Latter-day Saints would theoretically pose a great obstacle to the American passage to India. Even more threatening was the thought that the Mormons, with their alleged ambition for a Western Empire, desired to control the trade with Asia for themselves. That a similar notion was at least considered by the Saints is evident from an article that appeared in the Mormon periodical Times and Seasons less than three months before their westward exodus began. In reference to the inauguration of missionary work by other Christian churches in China, the editor wrote, "this...will open the door for the Elders of the Latter-day Saints, as our future location will embrace California, Oregon, or Vancouver's Island. We may bring the Chinese, with their wealth, directly into the kingdom of God." An eastern newspaper, generally sympathetic to the Mormon cause, inadvertently confirmed this threat when it declared that "there will be a mighty gathering from all nations of the earth to the Mormon empire now about to be established on the Pacific ocean!" The editor continued by stating, "One thing you may rely on-and that is, this people [the Mormons] will never annex themselves to any government on earth...as they are determined to be governed by their own laws."

Others, however, were not as convinced that the Mormons desired a totally independent empire in the West. At least one disaffected Mormon publicized his belief that Joseph Smith had plans to form a league with the Emperor of Russia "for the overthrow of the powers that be." A similar scenario is presented by a modern historian who contends that Smith sent ambassadors to Washington D.C., England, France, and Russia "to coordinate Mormon interests in Oregon, California, and Texas." Regardless of the exact nature of the supposedly planned Mormon empire, it is clear that many Americans feared the potential such an empire might have for not only polluting, but literally ruling the American passage to India.

Conclusion

The frequently expressed fears of a western Mormon empire must be understood in light of contemporary nineteenth-century views of the American West. The ambivalence with which the West was viewed at this time had direct consequences for the ways in which the Mormon threat was portrayed. The anxiety, however, over an alleged Mormon empire in the West, reflects a much larger concern for the American West in general. At this early stage in the development of the region, the nation simply did not know how or what to think of it. The fears surrounding the essentially unknown western region found expression in rhetoric aimed at the equally feared Mormon population and their purported empire in the West.
Frankly, however, the Mormons did desire to establish an independent nation in the West. And at least one sympathetic non-Mormon was encouraging them to do so. James Arlington Bennet, opportunistic reporter for the New York Sun, wrote to Willard Richards in April 1844. In his letter, he enthusiastically declared that "The Mormons should settle an Empire of their own. Not only thousands but millions would flock to an independent people. In This Country a Patriarchal Government with Joseph at the head would be just the thing. In unity there is power. Nothing would stop such a people." He continued, "If I were the Mormon Prophet I would abandon Nauvoo or at least have a small Colony leave and settle out of the present influence of the States. Just look back at the history of the world. Can you with a prophetic Eye view the millions flocking to his standard from all Nations of the Earth! Your present position is to[o] circumscribed-you have not a field big enough for your operations. Can you get a hold of California or Texas[?] Or when will you be able to Conquer...Mexico?"

Bennet's enthusiasm was not unmatched in Mormon circles. Indeed, only four days after arriving in the Salt Lake Valley Brigham Young announced that "he intended to have evry [sic] hole and corner from the Bay of [San] Francisco to Hudson bay known to us and that our people would be connected with every tribe of Indians throughout America." One need only examine Brigham Young's proposed boundaries for Deseret to comprehend that he had big plans for the Mormon colony. Moreover, Young and other Mormon leaders effectively operated their own government in Utah until the conclusion of the Mexican War frustrated their aspirations for independence. Nevertheless, the Latter-day Saints and their leaders continued to function as if a sovereign state, in spite of their formal classification as a United States' Territory. In fact, it was precisely the Mormons' apathy towards federal authority that excited national leaders to the point of commissioning thousands of armed troops to put down the supposed "Mormon Rebellion" in Utah. That the United States would, in this way, declare "war" on the Mormon populace is proof enough that the long-feared Mormon Empire was indeed a reality.

Comment: This article deals with the question of what will happen with familial ties after mortal life. The general conclusion is that these relationships do not end with death, but will continue on in the hereafter. However, the article does not connect these blessings to any kind of special ordinance or priesthood power; rather, it is presented as if it were a matter of common logic, with no scriptural passages given in its support whatsoever. Nonetheless, the article highlights the fact that others were thinking about the same questions and issues that were resolved by the Lord through Joseph Smith with introduction of the doctrines of sealing powers and eternal marriage. In fact, the text sounds strangely similar to the discussion of eternal families currently found in the 4th missionary discussion.

It would be an interesting study, indeed, to gauge how other religious groups at this time resolved this important question. Latter-day Saints often think the phrase "till death do you part" represents a belief in a literal termination of the marriage relationship in the hereafter. However, how accurate is this conception? Did nineteenth-century religionists truly believe that conjugal relationships would end at death? Or did they have a belief and hope that in some way these ties would be enjoyed in the hereafter as well? If so, what is their reasoning for believing such? What scriptural passages do they cite in support for such a belief? And, if familial ties will be enjoyed in heaven as they are on earth, what do they make of the phrase "till death do you part"? NOTE: this article is printed in the right-most column of the page. Part of the text, therefore, is unreadable because it runs into the paper's binding seam.

Comment: The article is primarily an argument for the primacy of the biblical text, raw and untouched by any creed or formulary text. That is, the author feels strongly that the Bible should be read as it is, without relying on any other interpretive text or commentary. The author feels this should be the case in Sunday School as well; children should be taught from the Bible itself, pure and simple. To refute those who would question children's ability to understand raw scripture, the author recounts several questions he posed to children as part of a Sunday School examination, along with the children's answers. One such question dealt with the definition of the kingdom of heaven. The child's response reflects the belief that the kingdom of heaven exists both within the individual and up above or in some other sphere. That the author (a Reverend) includes the response as an example of children's ability to correctly understand and learn from the Bible suggests that the answer is an accurate understanding of the concept of the kingdom of heaven.

The notion that the kingdom of heaven exists within a person, or is somehow embodied, contrasts with the Mormon belief in a literal kingdom of heaven, which ecclesiastically exists now in the form of the Church, and which will later exist as both an ecclesiastic and political kingdom with Christ at its head. However, the embodied notion is not too different from the Mormon belief that Zion, or the kingdom of heaven on earth, is "the pure in heart" (D&C 97: 21). In this sense, the concept of the kingdom of heaven in Mormon theology could be conceivably understood as existing within the righteous individual, or within a group of righteous individuals, all those who are pure in heart. In other words, the kingdom of heaven cannot exist outside of these persons.

Perhaps the question to be asked is, what distinctions (geographical, conceptual, or otherwise) were made in the minds of nineteenth-century Christians (including Mormons) concerning the kingdom of heaven? Furthermore, how did contemporary non-Mormon conceptions of the kingdom of heaven differ from or coincide with those of Joseph Smith, who actually sought to establish a literal political kingdom of heaven on earth? (I am thinking of the Council of Fifty).

Obviously, the Methodists thought the information important enough to include in their periodical. Four basic purposes of the Lord's Second Coming are set forth; each followed by extensive quotes from supporting biblical scriptures. There is great similarity between the beliefs expressed here and Mormon beliefs regarding the Second Coming of Christ.

"The day, or period of judgement will commence when the 'Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven.' Comment: The excerpt comes from a letter written by a missionary of the Methodist Church in Texas. While recounting his travels throughout western Texas he tells of an occasion to preach to a large group on the subject of baptism. After hearing the sermon several adults and infants were baptized "by pouring and sprinkling." It is unfortunate that the full text of this two-hour sermon is not included in the periodical. Nonetheless, the narration of the events surrounding the sermon provides an interesting glimpse into the way Methodists understood the doctrine of baptism at this time. This information may be useful in a discussion of different denominational views and practices of baptism in the nineteenth-century.

It is interesting how the author indirectly affirms the doctrinal correctness of his views and beliefs of baptism by reporting the number of persons baptized at the conclusion of the sermon. For the author, the fact that 100 people were baptized at this time is an affirmative response to his own rhetorical inquiry of "whether or not our views were considered Scriptural."

It is clear that the author of this letter believed in the doctrine of infant baptism, which stands in direct opposition to the Mormon belief regarding the same. Yet, both the author and the Mormons felt that their beliefs were scriptural. The Mormons had clear scriptural support for their belief in the Book of Mormon, but the issue of infant baptism is relatively mute in the Bible. It would be interesting, therefore, to examine what biblical references were cited when preaching this doctrine. That is, how exactly did those who professed to believe in infant baptism understand it as being "Scriptural?"

A final item of interest from this excerpt is the mention of baptism as being a "seal of the covenant." From this brief remark it is impossible to say what exactly this meant to the author of the letter. There is no way of knowing what covenant he is referring to. Regardless, the idea that the ordinance of baptism is a seal of a covenant, or a sign of the covenant's validity and authenticity, has parallels in Mormon theology, not only with baptism, but other covenants as well (e.g. temple and sacramental covenants). In each instance the outward ordinance signals that the inward covenant is truly being made or renewed. It would be interesting to know how other nineteenth-century religionists understood the notion of a baptismal covenant, if at all. What exactly did the baptismal covenant entail for them? How did they define it?

Excerpt (pages): "At this (Washington county) camp meeting we felt it our duty to give the public, and our own people especially, our views of Christian baptism. Accordingly a sermon upward of two hours in length was preached on the occasion; and whether or not our views were considered Scriptural, about 60 adults and 40 infants were baptized by pouring and sprinkling. These baptismal occasions were solemn, I assure you.-Parents were converted, and, becoming members of the visible Church themselves, they did not wish their little babes to be excluded, but brought them along with them, and they too were impressed with the seal of the covenant. Whole households were added to the Lord" (150).

Comment: The first excerpt comes from a reprinted section of a book entitled Familiar Letters to Henry Clay of Kentucky, describing a winter in the West Indies, by Joseph John Gurney, a Quaker, and published by Mahlon Day & Co., New York, in 1840. The reprinted section argues that emancipation of black slaves in the West Indies has led to economic, physical, moral, and religious advantages for both the white and black populations.

The second excerpt comes from an editorial comment that immediately precedes the reprinted sections.

(2) "The object of Mr. Gurney is to present the advantages of emancipation in the West Indies, and then to show that the same advantages would result in a general emancipation in the United States. Two classes of writers have addressed the public on the effects of the West India emancipation. The one class points it out as excelling in advantages; while the other party contends that it is a complete failure. Mr. Gurney endeavors to show that the results have been such as the warmest friends of the scheme could desire. And even if he errs, he falls into error on the side of liberty, and in behalf of the ignorant, and the oppressed. Nevertheless, we must contend, while we present this apology, if it be needed, that the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is best every way, and will answer the best ends after all. We think Mr. Gurney has mistaken in some points; but whether these errors will affect materially his conclusions, we are not prepared to say" (146).

The Lord's Supper, which was ordained by the blessed Savior for the benefit of the truly Christian Church, and doubtless to be perpetuated throughout all ages of this "present evil world," should be observed by every true believer and every penitent seeker of religion. But in order to distinguish those from the rash and the impenitent, and those who do not believe in rewards and punishments, and in the adorable divinity of our Savior, and likewise those guilty of immoral conduct, and those belonging to other orders of the general Church, our Discipline says, on page 75, section 23, that 'no person shall be admitted to the Lord's supper among us, who is guilty of any practice for which we would exclude a member of our Church.' I presume even though they belong as members to some other Church, we are not to admit them if they are thus guilty. But how shall we find out whether they be guilty or not, if we do not examine them? And this we seldom do. But the Discipline says moreover on the same page, 'Let no person that is not a member of our Church be admitted to the communion without examination, and some token given by an elder or deacon.' This instruction binds harder and harder; for though the subjects be in every sense qualified to partake of the supper of the Lord Jesus Christ, yet they are inadmissible if they are not examined and a 'token given,' no member of any order of the Church under heaven can be admitted agreeably to our Discipline, without examination and token. Then why do our presiding elders and preachers invite and entreat members of all orders of the Christian Church, without examination and token? Is it not inconsistent?" (149)

Comment: This is a letter to the Western Christian Advocate from an itinerant Methodist preacher writing from Franklin, Ia. (Indiana?). His comments concerning the need for, and necessity of, good books and their role in spreading holiness far and wide resonates with verses in the Doctrine and Covenants that counsel to "seek ye out of the best books" (D&C 88: 118; 109: 7, 14), and the accompanying belief that the glory of God is intelligence. The author's treatise on distributing (i.e. selling or gifting) good books to the populace may also have relevance to a discussion concerning the early distribution of Book of Mormons and Book of Commandments by Mormon missionaries and others in the nineteenth-century.

Researcher: Benjamin Pykles
Our Discipline names this among other duties [illegible] our preachers should attend to. In that book we all profess to believe, and doubtless we regulate our lives by it as much as any set of men on earth, of whom we have any knowledge. Great are our inducements and obligations to do so; nevertheless, it is a matter that should be deeply lamented, some of us at times make an effort at mending some plain duties, apparently small in themselves, which, if punctually attended to, would help to expel wickedness out of the world, and spread holiness far and wide, and plant it permanently among the nations of the earth. And may not spreading good books be considered one of these plain duties? Is it not rational and Scriptural? Is not the want of religious knowledge among the greatest wants? Can virtue exist where it is not? 'My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge.' How fearfully and awfully are the ignorant spoken of in the Bible. Hosea iv, 11; Isaiah v, 13. If such was the case in that more excusable day, who can find blindness enough in his heart to suppose himself excusable from making an effort to spread Bible knowledge (rather a scarce article) among the ignorant? Where is the humane man that is unwilling to help? Then trouble or not, or whether it will be pleasant or profitable, is not the thing. It will do good. Surely this is enough for any good man to know...What may spreading good books do? The labor of writing them has been performed, the art of printing discovered, and agents are distributing, yet thousands and tens of thousands are lying on shelves, waiting to take wings and go where they are so much needed. Are there no friends of the Redeemer who will help?" (149)

Comment: The article is taken from the London Christian Observer. Obviously, the Methodists agreed enough with what it states to want to reprint it in their periodical. There are several interesting issues within the text of the article. First, humans, possessing both material body and immaterial soul, are contrasted to angels and devils who are strictly spirit, and to beasts that are solely body. This differs with the concept put forth in the Book of Moses that all things created by God have both a material and immaterial component. That is, all living things were created spiritually before they were created naturally. One wonders what other people at the time thought about the creation of living things. Was Joseph Smith the only one at the time suggesting that all living things had physical and spiritual realities like humans? Why did others not believe this also? How radical was this way of thinking? What implications did it have on ideas about humanness, especially as it related to being literal children, or creations, of God?

Another interesting issue addressed in the article deals with the belief that in the resurrection we shall have increased intellectual powers. In support of this, the article paraphrases a scripture from the New Testament. How common of a notion was this in the nineteenth-century? In Mormon theology this concept is greatly elaborated, even to the point that we can become as the Gods in our mental capacities.

I am not sure how the author is defining the term "soul." It is peculiar, however, that in the first sentence of the fourth paragraph s/he states that s/he uses the term "discriminatingly." What does this mean? What is a soul to him/her? Is it the combination of a spirit and a body as it is defined in Mormon theology?

Also somewhat remarkable is the discussion of spiritual death and the second death being consequences of the fall of Adam. It is interesting that the author presents these two deaths as separate occurrences, much like in Mormon theology where spiritual death is understood as the separation from God, either temporarily as was the case with Adam and Eve, or permanently as will be the case for those who do not repent. This latter situation, as understood in Mormon theology, is what normally constitutes the second death. That is, the permanent separation of a person from God's presence at the time of the final judgement. It doesn't seem as though the author of the article understands the second death in this same way because s/he lists it as a consequence of Adam's fall, whereas Mormons understand it to be the result of an individual's own rebellious action. So what is meant by the "second death" in this article? The term and its companion, spiritual death, appear in the Bible. Thus, people had to have encountered them in their religions. But how were these terms understood? In what ways were others' understandings similar to or different than the way Mormons understood these terms?

Finally, the way hell is discussed in this article is also interesting. The author seems to equate hell with personal guilt when s/he says that hell on earth began when Adam and Eve tried to hide themselves after partaking of the forbidden fruit. Later on, hell is defined as wherever God is not. At another time in the article the author outlines the physical and social characteristics of hell. All of this begs the question of how was hell conceived by nineteenth-century religionists? Was it understood as a physical place? Or was it thought to be a state of mind or existence? This article suggests that it was and could be all of the above. But what about the Mormons? The Book of Mormon hints at the notion that hell is connected to feelings of eternal guilt. And then there is the belief in an outer darkness. Is this the Mormon hell? How did nineteenth-century Mormons conceive of hell and how did their ideas and beliefs compare or contrast with other contemporary religious groups?

Excerpt (pages): "Man is not, like the angels or devils, altogether spirit; nor like the beasts that perish, altogether body; but he has a material frame and an immaterial soul; and as they have been companions on earth, they shall be companions in the unseen world after the day of resurrection. What is meant by a 'glorified body,' we know not, but it is still a 'body;' it is therefore not immaterial; though in what material portion of its happiness will consist, we are not told, except by negatives; it will not hunger, thirst, or be subject to any pain or privation; by which we may understand positively that it will be filled with whatever of felicity is congenial to it as 'a glorified body.'

"But it is chiefly to delights of a spiritual character, that Scripture directs our attention. To be 'for ever with the Lord,' is the apostle Paul's summing up of heavenly enjoyment; and the descriptions in the book of revelation speak of love, joy, adoration and praise, as the peculiar characteristics of heaven; combined with the joyous exercises of enlarged as well as refined intellectual powers; for we shall see and know as we are seen and known. But all these are connected, and spring out of, the regenerated character; for heaven would not be heaven, to one who wished to be there only as an escape from hell.

"And so of the world of condemnation. Scripture addresses us not only as possessed of an immaterial spirit, but of corporeal beings capable of corporeal suffering; and as the body is the slave of the corrupt soul, so it will be its companion in punishment. The plain declarations of the inspired word leads us to this conclusion; which has always been regarded by the universal Church as a portion of revealed truth, not to be overlooked, but to be enforced in the few awfully emphatic words of holy writ, in order that knowing the terrors of the Lord we may persuade men.

"But there is great danger of appealing merely to physical alarm, instead of to the fearful punishment which awaits the soul-I use the word discriminatingly-in the future world of the righteous retribution. Our Lord, I think, intended to teach us this lesson, when, in reply to the rich man's entreaty to be allowed to warn his ungodly relatives of the punishment he was enduring, lest they should go to that place of torment, he tells us that Abraham answered, 'They have Moses and the prophets; if they believe not them, neither would they believe though one rose from the dead.' It is 'with the heart' that 'man believeth unto righteousness,' and though the terror of physical agony may alarm the transgressor, it has no power to change the heart.

"O, that men would consider these things! When Adam fell away from God, the retribution was not merely that he 'brought death into the world and all our woe,' as men ordinarily define those expressions; but, far worse, that he brought spiritual death and spiritual woe; and also the 'second death,' with its immeasurable woes. Hell upon earth began in the consciences of our first parents, as they attempted to conceal themselves amidst the trees of the garden from the presence of Him in whom they lived and moved and had their being, and their communion with whom had been the exalted delight of Paradise. The service of sin is often a foretaste of hell here; but what will be its wages hereafter? If wickedness causes such intense misery upon earth, where it is so much restrained in its effects by divine interposition and mercy, what must be its results where it revels and riots unchecked; where all that is base, and barbarous, and polluted, and revengeful, and blasphemous, and, horrible, and fiend-like, swelters forever in its own bloated malignity? God is not there, except in the inflictions of righteous retribution; and where he is absent, there is hell. It is not enough that we tremble at the thought of penal visitation; we must be renewed in the spirit of our mind; Christ must be formed in us, the hope of glory, we must be preparing for the enjoyment of heaven, as by following our fallen propensities, we are ripening ourselves for hell. What is 'physical' is not to be overlooked in exhorting men to repentance; but the Bible is the guide of the Christian minister, and most important is it to lead the sinner to perceive that 'to flee from the wrath to come,' implies infinitely more than mere alarm, unaccompanied by faith, or love, or hatred to sin, or renovation of spirit, or holiness of life" (149).

Comment: The excerpt is from a small article that exposes the reader to the apparent neglect of visiting and caring for the poor, a fault the author soundly condemns. That religious individuals at this time were concerned with visiting the poor is relevant to a discussion of how different religions conceived of and cared for the poor in the nineteenth-century. That is, how did different religious groups of the time perceive the poor? What did these groups see as the cause of the poverty? What actions were required of the non-poor, or of Christians in general, in relation to the poor? What programs were instituted with the intent to alleviate the suffering of the poor? Each of these questions, and more, can be answered in regards to early nineteenth-century Mormonism. How do Mormonism's answers to these questions compare or contrast to those of other contemporary groups?

Excerpt (pages): "How are Christians valued and preferred by externals rather than by internals? By gold rings, by outward honors and privileges, rather than by their graces? How do many of the rich contempt the poor? How are the poor neglected in visits? You go to the houses of the rich, but seldom go over the threshold of the poor; and what did Christ say to you? 'When thou makest a dinner or supper, call not thy friends, lest they bid thee again; but, when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the halt, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.' How seldom professors value as God doth! Let rich professors be sick, or under any other stroke of God's hand, what ado is there! But how are the poor of the Church or out of the Church despised. 'It will not serve us, nor save us,' saith a late bishop of England, 'to be able to say Abraham is our father, except we will charitably acknowledge the poorest Christian, even Lazarus, for brother.' Paul durst know no man after the flesh; yet dare you esteem men by their fleshy greatness in the world" (154).

Comment: The excerpt is from the secretary's report of the annual meeting of the Methodist Female Benevolent Society in Cincinnati. The excerpt is preceded by a brief report of the charitable contributions made by the society during the previous year. The secretary then launches into this wonderful philosophical debate concerning the effectiveness of giving freely to the poor. King Benjamin treats some of the issues the secretary is dealing with in his farewell discourse to his people (Mosiah 2-5). For example, when King Benjamin condemns those who withhold their substance from the poor, justifying their stinginess by thinking the beggar has brought his poverty upon himself, he is basically saying the same thing as the secretary when she states that "The principle upon which we act, is in the spirit of the injunction of the apostle, that 'as we have opportunity, let us do good to all men.'" This point is further developed by the secretary later in the excerpt as well.

All of this has relevance to a discussion of how "the poor" were perceived and cared for in the nineteenth-century. It would be interesting to know how different groups cared for the poor and on what grounds they did so. That is, why did they think they needed to care for the poor? What motivated them in doing so? How did they define the poor? What programs did they establish to help care for the poor? Etc.

This excerpt is particularly insightful because it provides a window into the mind and rationale of at least one person (or group) with respect to some interesting philosophical issues relating to the care of the poor. For example, we get a glimpse of the debate surrounding whether or not there is a "deserving poor" versus an "undeserving poor," and what is appropriate action for each. Further, it is clear from the article that the author (and presumably the group she represents) believes there is some real connection between improving the physical situation of the poor and improving their spiritual welfare at the same time. To compare and/or contrast these ideas with those of early Mormonism and other contemporary religious groups would make for an interesting study.

Excerpt (pages): "It is a subject of doubt with many, whether the bestowment of alms does not foster idleness and encourage vice; and the entertainment of the opinion not unfrequently checks the current of charity, as it also serves to appease the consciences of some who choose rather to speculate, than to act. That this evil may ensue, is not deniable, and possibly this society in some unfortunate appropriations of money, may have been instrumental in its promotion. The principle upon which we act, is in the spirit of the injunction of the apostle, that 'as we have opportunity, let us do good to all men.' It may be the prerogative of speculative philosophy to speculate upon the expediency of affording comfort to the miserable. Christianity doubts not, but puts forth the ready hand of love, treading with unerring steps the path that wisdom traces out. Though we think it unchristian to deny those relief, whose want is the result of even of a vicious life, yet observation has taught us that there are those, on whom to bestow alms, would be doing evil, rather than good. Of such, are those, who, while blessed with physical strength, rather sit in indolence, to be fed and clothed by others than by their labor; and there are those who have hitherto squandered their substance in riotous living, and who, if supplies for every necessity were given them, would but convert them into means for the continuous exercise of vicious indulgencies. A part of the duty of the managers of this society, is to teach economy, and induce habits of industry among those whom they assist. But there is a more enduring interest than these, or the alleviation of bodily suffering which those who contribute to its funds enable its managers to promote—the salvation of the souls of the poor. But for rendering the subject tedious, several instances could be mentioned, showing that these labors are not in vain. One account, however, given by one of the managers, cannot fail to gain your attention..." (151). The author then proceeds to relate a story of how one member of the society consistently assisted a woman with four children, all of whom were abandoned by their alcoholic father and husband. The story relates how in addition to relieving the family's physical suffering, the society member was able to assist the woman spiritually by helping her bring Christ into her life and sufferings.

The report concludes by stating, "To all those who have so liberally patronized it [the society], we return hearty thanks in the name of the poor who have been made in a degree at least comfortable by their bestowments. May what they have given, be returned into their basket and store, a hundred fold" (151).

Excerpt (pages): "1. The duty of contributing to charitable objects is INCUMBENT UPON ALL, the poor as well as the rich. Under the ancient economy, none were allowed to come before the Lord empty; but each one was required to give according to his ability—Deut. xvi, 16, 17. The same rule obtains under the New Testament, as is evident from the general teaching of the Savior—from his recognizing the gift of a cup of water—his commendation of the poor widow who cast two mites in the treasury—and from Paul's directions to the Church at Corinth, and his praise of the liberality of the poor Churches of Macedonia, 1 Cor. xvi, 2, and 2 Cor. viii, 2" (145).

"2. Benevolence should be INTELLIGENT. It requires information and reflection to determine to what objects, and in what proportion, a man should bestow his charity" (145).

"3. The PROPORTION OF HIS INCOME which shall be devoted to charitable uses, is for every man to determine for himself, subject, however, to his responsibility to God, 2 Cor. ix, 7. The Christian professes to regard all his property, not as his own, but as held in trust for the glory of his Maker. He is a steward, bound to appropriate his Lord's goods so as to honor all his claims, which come to him bearing the divine signature—including the claims of justice and humanity, his own lawful wants, and those of his neighbor and the Church. The only discretion conceded to him is that of distribution. To determine what proportion shall be devoted to that part of God's claim, which comes under the head of benevolence, no general rule can be given. But it is difficult to see how the spirit of the Savior can be exemplified, in pecuniary contribution, unless the amount be so great as to occasion actual self-denial...We have not, in the new dispensation, any command specifying the amount of our charities; partly because a rate of contribution adapted to one age would not meet the wants of another, and partly because ours is a dispensation of principles rather than specific rules...

"Our obligation to liberality is enhanced, moreover, by the fact, that we are freed from the costly system of sacrifices as enjoined in the Mosaic ritual. The support of the clerical order alone cost the Jews a tenth of all their income, besides the assessment of the first fruits, and other perquisites—an amount that is much greater than what is now paid for the support of the ministry...But chiefly, we have a greater—a nobler work to do, than had the ancient saints. Their efforts were limited to their own land; to us, the kingdoms of the earth are thrown open, and the wants of all our sinful and suffering race are spread before us...we are commanded to go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. The measure of our liberality must, therefore, be proportioned to our clearer light and greater obligation."

"4. The PERIODS FOR DESIGNATING a part of our income for charitable objects, should be frequent...But especially the moral result—the conquest over the innate selfishness of the heart—requires that the conscience be frequently exercised on this duty." (145)

Excerpt (pages): "In no part of the household affairs are the good order, neatness, and taste of the female head of the family more needed than in the arrangement of the tables at meals. They who feel above small matters, or regard an attention to them as savoring too much of fastidious refinement, or devotedness to the care of the body, overlook, in the opinion of the writer, their decidedly moral tendencies; he might add, their religious.

"God is a God of order. His works display it on every side. He delights, too, in the fairest forms of beauty. His own hand furnishes us with the only perfect exhibitions of it, and which no efforts of art can ever equal. Nature teems with beautiful objects. So does the intellectual and moral world...

"It is a radical error to suppose there is no connection between the soul and the body in these respects, and that order, neatness, and taste can be neglected in what pertains to the latter, without injury to the former in its most refined sentiments and holiest aspirations. The slovenly, the disorderly, and the filthy in the care of the person, or the concerns of the family, will have very serious, if not insuperable difficulties to encounter, in so adorning the soul with every Christian grace and virtue as to render it a fit temple for the in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit.

"And here, examples of the parents, and especially of the mother, in their influence over the children, are paramount to all other influences...The only way to secure these essential features of a complete and consistent character, is to begin right and uniformly, and the domestic table at meals comes in for a full share of the exertions necessary to be made.

"What an entire different aspect is given to this scene, according as the mother of the family has order, neatness, and taste, or is deficient in them!...How often, under such circumstances, with very scanty and unostentatious materials to be employed, does the frugal though nice housewife show by the appearance of her table and the conducting of the meals, that she knows well how to cast over the whole an attractive air of neatness and grace. The tact for doing this is, to a great extent, hereditary. Let the mother not forget this as her daughters are growing up around her.

"...When the arrangements of the table, and the deportment of the older persons are what they should be, the task of leading children to the formation of such habits as have been described, will be comparatively easy..." (148).

Comment: This article is part of a series of debates spanning many issues of The Candid Examiner between the Universalist editor of the journal and a critic of Universalist doctrine named "Observer." Here the "Observer" once again asserts the doctrine of free agency as problematic to the Universalist doctrine of universal grace. The Editor responds with an interesting allusion to the enslavement of Joseph as a means to suggest that God is able to achieve his purposes even through wickedness and disobedience. "But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive" (Gen. 50:20).

Excerpt (pages): "[The editor] proceeds [in a previous discourse], 'the idea that God committed to men a free agency omnipotent over his purpose, will and disposition, is in our view preposterous in the extreme.' Answer. 1. God has no purpose to save men but in a way consistent with their nature as moral agents. . . . 'In all the vidine dispensations in relation to man, God has an eye to his free agency, and will not destroy it'" (97).

Comment: The Rev. Ballou is credited with defining American Universalism in his sermon A Treatise on Atonement (1805). Here he outlines a liberal, metaphorical interpretation of the ordinance of baptism which contrasts greatly not only with the Mormon conception of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost as a literal cleansing and endowment of power, but with the more prosaic Protestant interpretations prevalent at the time.

Also note the more subtle contrast of Rev. Ballou's statement about the implausibility of man's nature changing in any significant way with the Book of Mormon doctrine that the grace of the atonement is transformative of man's nature: "For the natural man is an enemy to God . . . and will be forever . . . unless he yields to the enticings of the Holy Spirit, and putteth off the natural man and becometh a saint through the atonement of Christ the Lord. . . ." (Mos. 3:19).

Excerpt (pages): "'Except a man be born of water and the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' Water is used for cleansing and it is the spirit that quickeneth; but water does not change the nature of the thing which it cleanses, and what the spirit quickens is that which is cleansed by the water. Now, it is evident that the water which cleanses men is the word of truth, or the testimony of the gospel, and the spirit that quickens is the spirit of love and peace, which a knowledge of divine truth kindles and wakes up in the soul. . . . We cannot conceive of anything so misterious [sic] and unaccountable as the changing the nature of man in a moment, and making him a being different in nature from what he was before" (148).

Excerpt (pages): "And we contend that we can and have proved when infant baptism was introduced, for it was not introduced by Christ or his Apostles, as there is not a word about it in the New Testament.' This last flourish of the editor's pen, has placed all who believe infant baptism, in a very unfavorable point of view. The editor and his adherents, who inveigh against 'High Church' principles, take ground which makes me feel awful. He and they exclude from the Lord's supper all who have not been baptized by immersion. Our saviour has made the packaging of this ordinance obligatory and has nowhere said that baptism by immersion is to be the condition. Faith is the condition of salvation, not baptism. 'He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be damned,' or if you please, condemned. Mark 16,16. Look at this verse, ye high toned baptists and shudder at the thought, (if ye have the right to administer the ordinances) of shutting the door of the church against any honest and sincere soul who wishes to partake with you, but who can not submit to be re-baptized. You lay greater stress on baptism, than St. Paul. . . . If we are to exclude all from the Lamb's supper in heaven, who have not submitted to be plunged, there will be but very few guests indeed. From such sentiment, good Lord deliver me" (154-5).

"Therefore, Jesus, with an eye to the law covenant, which could not give life, calls up the attention of the Jews to what had been done under it, by that wicked nation, and in spite of all its influence, their wicked will had been more powerful than the influence of the law, even Christ himself could not gather them by the law, for they would not. . . . As much as though he had said, All there is in your law, has been faithfully tried, yet ye are not saved . . . there is nothing in all the house of Moses, can save one guilty soul. . . .

"Now the day of God's power is the gospel day of grace, it extends over two worlds, this and that to come, this life in the morning, that to come the evening of the gospel day; so that either in the forenoon of afternoon of the day of God's power, all shall be willing through grace, some earlier and others later.

"And yet the terrors of the law . . . will never make one soul willing, these means may frighten many, but bring none to love God supremely and their neighbor as themselves, but grace is all-sufficient" (1).
Comment: Within the context of a sermon on the parables of Matthew 25, this passage interprets the parabolic judgments of the foolish virgins, the unprofitable servants, and the goats on the left hand of the shepherd in the parable of the sheep and the goats as the destruction of the Jerusalem attendant to Christ's closing of the Mosaic dispensation. It also draws some parallels between the destructions attending the closing of the Mosaic dispensation and those attending the day of "general retribution" (38).

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "The language of our Lord, in the 31st verse, appears to be perfectly applicable to those calamitous and afflicting occurrences which would precede the final close of the Mosaic dispensation; it is precisely the same as that used professedly in reference to them; 'When the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels,' or messengers, 'and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the Son or man coming in his kingdom.' The apostle John, and most likely others of our Lord's disciples, survived the destruction of Jerusalem, the consequent subversion of the Jewish state, and the termination of the Mosaic dispensation, but not the day of general retribution. . . . This passage [Matt. 24:30] is expressly applied by our Lord to the destruction of the Jewish dispensation and nation" (38).

Nature of Source: This scholarly religious magazine explored in depth various religious topics from the Universalist point of view. It was publised bi-monthly and edited by H. Ballou and Son. Rev. Ballou is perhaps the most noted Universalist in early nineteenth century America. His sermon on the atonement is looked upon by most religious historians as the founding document of American Universalism.
Comment: This is an extended, scholarly consideration of the use of the phrase, 'Kingdom of God' by Jesus and the apostles in the New Testament. Ballou first examines Old Testament prophecies concerning the kingdom to establish what the historically contextual expectations might have been, then he examines passage after passage in the New Testament and makes astute connections between them and the parables ("the kingdom of heaven is like. . ."). His interpretation hinges on the liberal translation of the Greek terms often translated as "kingdom" and "world" as meaning "reign" and "age"--a shift from spatial orientation of the kingdom to a temporal one. He examines some of the political implications of the terms, pointing out how the Jews were disappointed when Jesus came as a religious leader and not a political one, but, although he insists that Jesus's reign is a "purely religious" one, he implicates the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Temple as proof of the Lord's subjection of the worldly government to his religious one. Further, Ballou allows for some plurality in the use of the phrase, conceding that "Sometimes [it] seems to relate to the administration, without including spiritual principles" (11), sometimes to the people themselves who will be gathered out of the earth. It is an impressive treatment, however he fails to extrapolate meanings and implications to the present day, leaving us instead with Paul and the early Christians.

Comment: These two entries constitute a reader's argument and editor's rebuttal. The discussion of endless punishment is couched in an extended debate about the nature of grace. Essentially, the "observer" contends that for the saved to be rewarded or punished at all on the basis of individual deeds in life is a denial of the saving power of Jesus. He contends that reward or punishment are solely contingent upon the acceptance or rejection of Jesus as mediator. The editor contends that such a view precludes punishment for any sin save the sin of rejecting Christ, and that, in stead, "every transgression receives a just recompense, but severer punishment awaits those who add to their other sins that or rejecting a mediator" (9). The editor cites David and other errant prophets as examples of men who, though Godly, were still made to suffer for their transgressions.

I have listed as relevant material only a small selection which bears most directly upon the doctrine of endless punishment, however the entire surrounding discussion (pp. 9-14 and see below) is well worth examining as a fine example of early nineteenth century conceptions of the quality and scope of the Lord's atoning mediation and subsequent discussion of such doctrinal categories as justification before the law and individual agency.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "But he [the editor] proceeds to make the following objection or our doctrine, 'if sinners are punished endlessly for their sins committed in this world, how and when will they be punished for the sins they commit during this eternity of punishment?' . . . For the scriptures have given us no information with regard to sins committed after death.--The doctrine of eternal punishment for sins committed in this life is a matter of revelation, and as such we receive it, but as to sins committed in another state, we know nothing of them. He might as well ask if the righteous were endlessly rewarded for their righteousness in this world, how and when will they be rewarded for their righteousness during that eternity of happiness? Or we might retort his argument thus, if the sinner is punished a limited time, after his transgression, when will he be punished for the sins he commits during this limited punishment: If it be answered, at some time still subsequent, ; we might them repeat the same enquiry; where it he to be punished for the sins he commits during this time of punishment also? and so on ad in finitum! But should it be said, that when he begins to receive his punishment he ceases to sin, this will apply as well to our system as to his, and as effectually relive it from his objection as it will his from the same objection retorted" (10).

[Editor's reply]
"The statement that 'eternal punishment for sins committed in this life, is a matter of revelation,' is easier asserted than proved, and as the scriptures speak of punishment only for sinners and never for holy beings, it would be as easy to prove that sin extends into another [sic] state and through eternity, as that punishment does. Observer and all others who believe in endless punishment for sins committed in this life, must acknowledge, either that an eternity of mental sin and alienation go unpunished or that an eternity of punishment, is inflicted on beings after they have become perfectly holy. Either of these suppositions would be the grossest absurdity which is sufficient of itself to explode the doctrine of endless punishment for sins committed in this life. . . . Universalists do not believe, that 'the righteous are endlessly rewarded for their righteousness in this world;' neither do they believe in precise allotments of time to punish men for particular periods of their committing sins; neither do they believe in the manifest absurdity 'that when he begins to receive his punishment he ceases to sin.' But universalists believe as we have stated before, that sin and misery are inseparably connected as cause and effect, and that God is not governed by any rules of arbitrary jurisprudence in the punishments he inflicts, which might sometimes clash with his will and mercy, but is dictated by his goodness and wisdom, according to the circumstances of the case" (12).

In its simplest form it is shocking enough; for in its simplest form it supposes that there are human beings, who, within the round of a few earthly years, can commit sin enough to render themselves worthy of ceaseless torment through the countless ages of eternity and that no remorse, no repentance, no desire to return to God and goodness will ever entitle them to the least remission or suspension of this inconceivable woe, no to the slightest hope that it will ever be mitigated of come to an end" (81).

Comment: This article is composed of twelve sundry precepts listed by number which are linked only as purported tenets of "Jehova's plan of infinite grace." The conception of gospel precepts as parts of a grand narrative called a "plan" (see source) seems noteable in reference to Joseph Smith, as does the (albeit sketchy) reasoning below that God's temporal creations must in some sense be without beginning or end.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "We may safely believe in one God and spiritual father, denominated the father of the spirits of all flesh, and that he is infinite and unchangeable in all his attributes, and that he did create all things by Jesus Christ and for him: but we are not bound to believe that all things were created out of nothing lest this should presuppose that all will return to nothing again in the final end, as we may safely believe that any thing which has a beginning of existence in the most strict and essential sense, can never have eternity connected with such existence, as eternity has no beginning" (86).
Comment: The following is a brief discussion of the fate of those who die without having heard the good word. The single quote marks represent the author quoting a previous entry by the editor. The broader context is an argument concerning the nature of grace. The "observer" contends that for the saved to be rewarded or punished at all on the basis of individual deeds in life is a denial of the saving power of Jesus. He contends that reward or punishment are solely contingent upon the acceptance or rejection of Jesus as mediator. The editor contends that such a view precludes punishment for any sin save the sin of rejecting Christ, and that, in stead, "every transgression receives a just recompense, but severer punishment awaits those who add to their other sins that of rejecting a mediator" (9). Contrast this discussion with the Book of Mormon doctrine that the grace of the atonement provides for those who sin in ignorance.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "As to those who never heard of the mediator, it will doubtless 'be accepted of them according to what they have, and not according to what they have not.' It must be through the mediator that they are accepted on the improvement of their talent, for 'none cometh to the father but by him,' he is emphatically 'the way.' But if they abuse the light accepted through Christ,--this is, in some sense rejecting the mediator and they are justly punished in proportion to the light they have sinned against" (9).

Comment: Commentary on Isaiah 57:15-6: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy; I dwell in the high and holy place. . . ." The author interprets the eternal nature of God's presence and existence as being qualitatively eternal, not durationally eternal. The author seems to suggest that God does not exist in time at all, and hence his unchangeableness requires that he not waver in his pleasure or displeasure towards us according to our righteous or wicked acts in time. Compare discussions of God's time and habitation in Abraham 3 and elsewhere.
"It seems to be the general opinion of people, that the divine Ruler of the universe has located his throne in some particular place, far above the globe we inhabit. This vulgar, but unphilosophical notion seems to be favored by the word place. . . But . . . the true sense of the prophet is better expressed, and more easily understood, by leaving the word place out of the text. . . (24)

"Not high and holy place; but in high and holy minds or beings. God dwells in all hearts which are pure. . . " (25). The eternity which God inhabiteth could no more have had a beginning, than it can have an end. . . (26).

"It was always impossible for God to know any more, or any less, than he always knew. . . If our deductions are allowed to stand, it is very clear that the divine favor can neither be gained nor lost. And as to the displeasure of the Almighty, there can be no more displeasure in him, than did always there exist. . . " (28).

Comment: This incidental discussion of agency and happiness in context of a broader defense of the doctrine of universal grace seems comparable to 2Nephi 2: 25 in its implication that God's purpose in giving man agency is that he might be happy.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "That man is a moral agent, is self-evident, that his agency is limited I know, not as any den; and that his moral agent is endowed with an endless desire after happiness; but we read that man or the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly . . . therefore we find man through folly, or vanity, seeking, where it is not to be found, and by so doing, bringing on himself misery and subjecting himself to punishment, for not seeking happiness in the way pointed out by his Creator. . . ." In addition to articles on religion and on the activities of Universalist societies, it included sermons, Bible studies, poetry, anecdotes, and a good deal of selected material, especially from Universalist magazines.

Comment: This article is reprinted from Star of the South, a periodical published in Milledgeville Georgia. The editor of that periodical is here quoting Addison as part of his argument that God, being benevolent, cannot condemn any soul to Hell, but that all souls will "flourish" eternally.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "How can it enter into the thoughts of man, that the soul, which is capable of immense perfections, and of receiving new improvements to all eternity, shall fall away into nothing, (and we will add, into hellfire and eternal torments, where its existence, must be worse than no existence,) as soon as it is created? . . . How can we find that wisdom which shines through all his works, in the formation of man, without looking on this world as only a nursery for the next, without believing that the several generations of rational creatures which rise up and disappear in quick succession, are only to receive their first rudiments of existence here, and afterward to be transplanted into a more friendly climate, where they may flourish to all eternity" (Addison as qtd. in "Star" 15).

Comment: This is the final issue of The Candid Examiner. The editor, attempting here to draw some conclusions about the journal's run, extols the success of Universalism in the area. Author: Hosea Ballou, 2d.
The king himself was present, selecting his subjects; and to borrow a figure from one of his parables, his kingdom was then like a grain of mustard-seed planted in the earth. All things, however, were fast disposing to quicken and to bring forth its germ; in a short time it would spring into view, feeble indeed in appearance, but with its proper lights and proportions; and before the close of that generation, it would become as a great tree, spreading out its branches to the four quarters of heaven.
"... It [the phrase 'Kingdom of Heaven'] denoted, in general, a new religious economy, instituted by God, and by his special care established and extended in the world, breaking down every opposing power, and assimilating all things to its own peculiar character. This economy we now call, by a name rather vague, the gospel dispensation; but by the ancient Jews it would have been more properly denominated the reign of the Messiah. Its fundamental principle was pure religion, both theoretical and practical; and accordingly, St. Paul says that 'The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost [Rom. 14:17]. ... In every case, the primary idea is still the same: that of a religious dominion exercised by Heaven over individuals or communities" (10-11).

"But still more often did [Jesus] allude to the tremendous revolution that was to take place in the end of that age; when his kingdom should come with power, overthrowing the Jewish polity, closing the national existence of his implacable enemies, and opening on his religion a long prospect of repose and unobstructed diffusion. 'The kingdom of heaven,' said he, 'is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered the good into vessels but cast the bad away. So shall it be at the end of the world [literally, age:] the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire. There shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.' It is scarcely necessary to remark, that the event verified the parable: the kingdom of heaven, or the external system of its administration, originally included the Hews, as it was first preached to them, and as Christ was born their king; but as they refused to yield to its requisitions, they were warned that they who were then its children, should be cast out of it, and that it should be given to a nation bringing forth its fruits. After long forbearance, the threatening was put into actual execution in the end of that age. They were rejected; their prescribed mode of worship effectually abolished, by the destruction of their temple and city. ..." (18, brackets his).

"But although the apostles, from the day of Pentecost forwards, spoke of the kingdom of God as being already present, and of themselves as being already in it, we should nevertheless remember that it had as yet come only in its doctrinal and moral principles,—only in that respect in which St. Paul described it, as 'righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Within a very few years, however, it was, according to Christ's promise, to be far more openly and signally manifested, in the entire suppression of the Mosaic economy, and in the accompanying scene of providential retribution, when the Christians would be delivered from persecution, and established in prosperity, by the terrible ruin of their implacable enemies" (22-3).

Title of Periodical: The Universalist Expositor (Vol. 1)

Nature of Source: This scholarly religious magazine explored in depth various religious topics from the Universalist point of view. Contents included dissertations on points of Biblical literature, explanations of scriptural phrases and subjects, doctrinal discussions, sermons, occasional reviews of religious books, and some poetry. It was published bi-monthly and edited by H. Ballou and Son. Rev. Ballou is perhaps the most noted Universalist in early nineteenth century America. His sermon on the atonement is looked upon by most religious historians as the founding document of American Universalism.
Comment: This is written in response to an article called "Disappointment in the Last Day," first printed in what is apparently a Unitarian publication, Spirit of the Pilgrim (Vol. 3, No. 7), and reprinted here for purposes of discussion. "Disappointment" outlines six types of people who will be "surprised" in the Day of Judgment and urges the "beloved reader" not to procrastinate his repentance. Ballou's retort is, as ever, quite involved and directed to the various points of doctrine established in "Disappointment," and hence is difficult to represent here in excerpted form. The following excerpt is representative of the basic thesis and tenor of the piece, but interested researchers are encouraged to check the source material on microfilm. Ballou's reasoned repudiation of the doctrine of a "Last Day" hinges upon apparent inconsistencies in that doctrine (the problem of delayed judgment since people have been dying for thousands of years, the seemingly arbitrary grounds for judging all people as one) as well as general Universalist arguments against judgment given God's beneficence and close interpretation of New Testament prooftexts.

Contrast the apocalyptic tone so prevalent in the Doctrine and Covenants: "prepare the saints for the hour of judgment which is to come" (D&C 88:84); "For the day of my visitation cometh speedily" (D&C 124:10); "And behold, and lo, I com quickly to judgment, to convince all of their ungodly deeds. . . ." (D&C 99:5).

Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "This subject, which divines are in the habit of denominating the last day, the judgement day, the last great day, the last judgement, &c, &c, must be allowed, by all reasonable, reflecting people, to have a claim on their serious consideration, scarcely inferior to the most momentous subjects in the whole system of theology. In all respects but one, it cannot be considered of less moment than the most essential. This one exception to the claims of this subject, rests with the question, whether it be in fact a doctrine taught in the scriptures" (65).

Title of Article: "A Dissertation on the Phrases, End of the World, Last Days, Last Time, &c. as used in the New Testament" Ballou takes exception to Biblical scholars who translate the Greek word [Greek approximated]Üíwv according to Hebrew idiom to mean this material world. He maintains that standard, if not invariant, usage of the term implied "a period of time, a duration, of greater or less extent" (98). Taking "age" as his interpretation, Ballou attempts to show how all Messianic prophecies about the "last days" or "end of the world" have fulfillment in Jesus Christ at the meridian of time. His reasoning proceeds from the Talmudic texts and the writings of Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel to establish the Jewish tradition of dividing time between the present age, and the age of the Messiah which was to come.

Ballou considers such texts as Excerpt (pages): "There are many passages in the New Testament, which seem plainly to intimate, and indeed expressly to assert, that the age in which the apostles lived, was the last time, or the end of the world. How difficult soever it may be, to account for the circumstance, the fact itself is unquestionable, as the reader will perceive by the following instances. . . ." (95).

[see source material for Ballou's citations and examples]

"But how shall we account for their having used such phrasology? We know that, according to our modern acception of the terms, theirs were not the last days, nor that period the end of the world; and why did they call them such? Several eminent christians, among whom are Grotius, Locke, Whiston, Priestley, and some of the German divines, have felt themselves driven to the conclusion, that the apostles, if not Christ himself, absolutely mistook so egregiously, as to think that the material wrold would be actually destroyed, about the close of their own age. Other commentators, again, have passed in marked silence over part of the passages now before us; and then, taking a sudden leap, with the utmost gravity, over all the obstacles of common sense and manifest fact, they have applied the rest, on their own authority, to a period yet future. But a very common course with Orthodox, as well as Liberal critics, has been, to explain the subject by the consideration, that the prominent expression ought to have been translated, not 'end of the world,' but 'end of the age, or dispensation'" (97).

Samuel Gatchel was a Deacon in the Second Congregational Church of Marblehead, MA.
Comment: A millennialist tract which uses numerology in conjunction with Daniel 8:14 and Daniel 12:12 to determine that the Jews will be converted to Christ by 1782—"then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" (Dan. 8:14) and "the Lord will be the hope of his people and the strength of Israel" (Joel 3:16). It further interprets Joel 3:15 ("the sun and moon shall be darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining") to be in direct reference to a solar eclipse witnessed in New England on May 19, 1780, implicating New England as the "Zion" and "New Jerusalem" spoken of in Joel (see Joel 3:16). New England is "the wilderness" where the Church fled in Revelations 12:6.

And to the Woman were given two wings of a great eagle: (This first paragraph shews that the Woman, that is the Church, should have shiping prepared that she should wing away over the Atlantic to America, for as an eagle flies by the force of air, so is a ship carried to her port by the force of air;) that she might fly into the wilderness into her place. No greater wilderness at the days of our Fore-fathers than North-America; it was like a new found world, and our Fathers left their native Country that they might worship God in truth agreeable [sic] to the Scripture: And as the church of Rome is predominant in most places in Europe, and the church of England is predominant [sic] in Great-Britain and Ireland; and both of these churches are of an antichristian faith, for the former confesseth that the Pope is head of the church of Rome, while the latter confess that the reigning King of Great-Britain is their head. But the New-England Churches believe and confess Jesus Christ to be the Head, King and High-priest of the Congregational Churches, and these Churches are predominant in New-England: Therefore I do conclude that it is the place the Prophet Joel calls Zion and Jerusalem, where the Lord shall utter his voice; and if the Phenomenon of the nineteenth of May, 1780 was mostly confined to New-England, you need no greater evidence, for it is the voice of God" (5-7).

Comment: The author endeavors to demonstrate with a thorough consideration of references to early apostolic practice in the New Testament and in Roman historical records dating from the 1st and 2nd century A.D. that the practice of worshiping the Lord on Sunday was never construed to be a continuation of the Mosaic law of the Sabbath. Calling attention to discrepancies in practice, purpose, and appellation, the author suggests that the Sabbath was fulfilled in Christ and that modern Christians should disabuse themselves of false notions concerning the prohibitive nature of the Lord's day which have their root in Mosaic prohibitions.

This exercise can be directly contrasted with revelations concerning the Sabbath in the Doctrine and Covenants (59:9-15; 68:29) and more generally contrasted with Joseph Smith's conception of doctrinal continuity between the Old and New Testaments. While Joseph Smith did acknowledge that certain laws were expedient only to the Jews (such as circumcision), he also taught that the entirety of the gospel of Christ (including the baptismal covenant) was preached to the patriarchs from the time of Adam (see D&C 29:42; Moses 5,6 particularly 6:64-5).

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "The apostles seem to have thought that the sabbath, instead of being transferred to another day, was abolished with the rest of the Mosaic institutions" (48). "[A search of the New Testament, specifically Rev. 1:10 here] throws no light whatever on the practice of the first Christians with regard to the observance of Sunday, except that they sometimes distinguished it by the appellation, not of the Sabbath, but of the Lord's day, perhaps in honor of their Lord's resurrection. Of the two former passages [Acts 20:7 & 1 Cor. 26:2], one shows that they were accustomed to meet together on that day, and to break bread; and the other, that it was judged peculiarly convenient for them to prepare, at that time, their donations for their poor brethren. That they abstained from their ordinary employments through the whole of the day, we have no evidence; and the want of such proof, renders it rather probable that they did not. For it is by no means reasonable to suppose that they would all spontaneously consecrate the season to rest, and to a rigorous exclusion of labor, without a general concert among themselves, or an express requirement from the Apostles, of which we must have found some traces in the New Testament" (50).

Comment: This article is composed of twelve sundry precepts listed by number which are linked only as purported tenets of "Jehova's plan of infinite grace." The conception of gospel precepts as parts of a grand narrative called a "plan" seems notable in reference to Joseph Smith (see source), as does the repudiation of an outwardly organized religion below. Also, note the interesting use of the "new name" doctrine from Revelations to denote the secret Church of Christ.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "We may believe that as Chirst the head is invisible so also is his true church as to the outward, it cannot be known by any outward ordinances, for every member of Christ's church received a new name, which none knows but himself, and Chirst in God: He knows his church and is known of his. We may therefore reasonably infer that there may be many who are outwardly connected with the different visible churches which are remonstrating against each other, who possess the spirit of Chirst and are connected to his true invisible circh by a spiritual communion; and also there may be some or many in each of these outward churches who are hypocrites, or deceived and do not belong to the true church of Christ" (86).
This article is reprinted from The Religious Inquirer. The author argues against a coldness of mind and disrespect manifested by many who contend concerning religious doctrine or say that their church is the only true church. The author also makes general comments about contention and haughtiness as opposed to the felicity of Christ.

Excerpt (pages):
"...what excessive folly and injustice does that person manifest, whose unreasonable intolerance would compel every one to bow to his standard, & fall down & worship the God which his fancy has created. ... Such are the different constitutions of the mind of man, that it is as impossible for all to believe alike, as it is for all to feel alike. And that man who reproaches his neighbor for thinking differently from what he does, manifests just as much understanding as he, who quarrels with his neighbor for not dreaming as he does" (6-7).

Comment: This is an example of the contemporary use of the term priestcraft in Joseph Smith's day, the historical setting into which the Book of Mormon and its discussions of priestcraft would come forth. The article is a discussion of how the religious freedoms in the Declaration of Independence make it difficult for priests to thrive financially.
Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "But thank heaven a free country is poor soil for priestcraft to grow upon; though it struggles hard to send forth its noxious and deleterious branches. Nothing is more wanted in this day than the general consent of the community, expressed in a determination to discountenance this class of aspiring ambitious men. . . . They have no authority for their mission from the court of heaven, and therefore we have a perfect right to pronounce them real impostors. Cease to pay them a farthing for preaching, and they will leave their flocks as they did in Virginia when they lost their salaries there" (44-5).

Nature of Source: A religious bi-weekly publication mainly promoting the Universalist doctrine. In addition to articles on religion and on the activities of Universalist societies, it included sermons, Bible studies, poetry, anecdotes, and a good deal of selected material, especially from Universalist magazines.
Comment: There seems to be a qualified sense of the apostasy here since Universalists place no emphasis on line of authority, but the reference to a "pure church" being lost seems to imply that such a church did exist at one time, presumably at the time of Christ. There is certainly no sense, however, that the restoration of such a church would require a unilateral act of God.
The author goes on to suggest as an instructive that individual seekers should not rely too much on societies but should judge and act for themselves.
Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "But now, where shall a society be found that can inspire confidence that they are a pure church, and are acting conformable to the requirements of the gospel; it may be truly said, no where. In this respect all religious societies seem to fail and indeed they have become so much alike, that they begin to unite with each other, to esteem, honour and love one another, as the world esteems, honours and loves its own.-- From religious societies or sects, therefore, all hope or encouragement seems to be cut off, and there is no ground to expect that they will get any better or promote the cause of righteousness in the world. The prophets prophecy falsely, the priests bear rule, and the people love to have it so" (22-3).

material, especially from Universalist magazines.
Comment: The author of this entry attempts to prove on the basis of a single passage from Origen, that the early fathers, and hence the apostles themselves, were Universalists; and then to fend off any objection to this generalization by proving that the apostasy of the "religion of the Roman empire" could not have occurred as early as the third century. It is an interesting attempt at historical revision to claim a primitive basis of authority for the Universalist's fundamental doctrine.
The author's use of the scriptural phrase "restitution of all things" to mean the universal salvation of all souls is also noteworthy.
Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "ORIGEN, who was born near the close of the second century, and flourished about A.D. 230, was of opinion that 'after long periods of time, the damned shall be released from their torments, and restored to a new state of probation;' . . . It follows of consequence that the contemporaries of Origen were Universalists. But these were taught by the disciples of the apostles; the disciples of the apostles must therefore have taught the same doctrine, or Origen and his fellow believers must have apostatized from the faith. That no such apostasy took place, is manifest, from the fact, that they are no where charged with any deviation from the faith, before the fifth century; nor is there a single intimation that the restoration was a novel opinion. If the disciples of the apostles taught the doctrine of the restitution, (and it is plain they did) then the apostles must have taught the same . . . no evidence can be given . . . that the apostles themselves did not preach the 'restitution of all things.' . . . If it be objected, that possibly the whole church had become corrupted; it may be asked whether this corruption took place in the time of Origen, or the preceding age? If before his time, it supposes the apostolic disciples guilty. . . . The notion of any great and sudden change in the public mind, in regard to religion is wholly preposterous . . . . A retrospect of these facts, should inspire us with confidence, that the primitive doctrine of the restitution, will, with the progress of research, arise from the obscurity into which it has fallen, and in which the interests and prejudices of men have so long held it. . . ." (67-8)

Comment: The Rev. Ballou is credited with defining American Universalism in his sermon A Treatise on Atonement (1805). Here he outlines a symbolic interpretation of the doctrine of being "born again" by considering how democracy was born out of monarchy and the nation of the United States was "born again." It is a fascinating sacrifical history of secular history which is paired in the sermon with a consideration of ecclesiastical history--how Protestantism was "born again" out of Catholocism in the days of Luther (see source, I have not excerpted this passage).
Compare the divine mission of the United States as described out in DC 101 and 1 Nephi 13.

Excerpt (pages): "If we cast our minds back to the time when these states were under the British government, we find a people, who notwithstanding they had a strong sense and love of liberty, were educated in the monarchial system, and had many predilections in favor of a kingly government. And when the full time had come for a new system to be introduced, and a few enlightened politicians boldly stepped forward to point out the corruption of monarchy, and the oppressions it was meditating to fix on the people in all future time, and to call the attention of Americans to the true system of political liberty, and a representative government, the times presented may features [sic] similar to those when the gospel was first propagated in the world.

"In one view of the great subject, the Savior said, 'Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother. . . .' So was it in the trying day when a nation was to be born again, politically speaking. Such were the views of many, and such their love for the distinctions of monarchy, for the difference of the high and low, that they had rather part with anything else, than to part with their notions of king, of lord, and the trappings of monarchy. To such it might have been said, that unless they were born again they could not enter into the system of liberty, and the rights of man" (149).

Comment: This allegorical explication of Jesus's raising of Lazarus from the dead is notable in that, on the basis of Christ's power to redeem even those who die in their unbelief, it implies a purgatorial state after death where the wicked go in their lack of understanding and unbelief to await the word of Christ, and so implies the necessary work of declaring the word in the spirit to unbelievers who die in the flesh. Compare Scriptural Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith pp. 248, 251 and 356 (the doctrine is also laid out, of course, by Joseph F. Smith in DC 138).

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages):

"1. Sick Lazarus, notwithstanding the earnest prayers of his sisters and others was not restored in health to the society of his friends, before death, but after. Which allegorically represents any one, who is diseased with sin and unbelief, and who, notwithstanding the most earnest solicitations and prayers of the church for the conversion of sinners, is not converted and restored to a union in the household of faith, before death, but dies unreconciled to God.

"2. The body of Lazarus, was shut from mortal view in a gloomy cave; which may represent any one in the invisible world, who is shut out of the enjoyment of happy communion with the saints in glory.

"3. A stone was laid at the mouth or door of the cave, which is a figure of a stony heart of unbelief at the door of conscience, in the hour of death.

"4. The napkin which was bound about the head, was an emblem of the veil remaining after death untaken away, whereby the eyes of the understanding of one who dies in sin, is darkened in that state, till the veil is taken away.

"5. The body after death, being bound hand and foot with grave clothes, is a sign of one in the spiritual world, so fettered with his own wickedness and unbelief that he cannot extricate himself from his state of bondage, so as to come to Christ in his own strength, but Jesus must come to him, if he is ever delivered.

"6. As Jesus said concerning dead Lazarus, with a divine voice, 'Let us go to him.' This signifies the will of him, who said ('Let there be light and there was light,') and that it is his pleasure, that Christ should go and deliver those, in a condition after death, as already described by the body of Lazarus.

"7. By the prayer of Jesus at the cave, it is implied that he intercedes for the dead also, as truly as for the living.

"8. As Jesus Christ next turned and addressed him who had been in his grave four days, 'Lazarus come forth.' We may learn that he, but the word of his power, speaks deliverance to the captives after death.

"9. As Lazarus obeyed and came forth; it signifies the obedience of faith wrought in the soul after death through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"10. And as Jesus next said, 'loose him and let him go.' Two things are implied by this part; first, that no captive in that state is able to loose himself and go free, second, that such sinners shall, by the word of Christ's power, be loose and set free. Yea, 'delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God.' Such is the voice of that miracle.

"... Then it is no wonder Jesus should say, 'I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.' Which supposes one to become a believer after death.

"From the very nature of the subject, we may reasonably infer, that the death expressed by our Lord, in the text, is natural death, such as Lazarus died by a fit of sickness. To say it means carnal mindedness, or in other words spiritual death, would be to make nonsense of the text.
"For it is very clear from the mode of every expression in it, that both the death and the exercise of belief are said to exist both at the same time. For, 'Though he were dead,' is not a form of expression to imply the past tense, because the verb is in the subjunctive mode, and is the same as though it had been thus expressed; He that believeth in men, though he be dead, yet shall he live. Now I would ask, How can a man be carnally minded, and exercise true faith at the same time; can he thus serve two masters at once? Again, how can a man be spiritually dead in sin, and at the same time be alive in God? Kind reader, these things cannot be. However, I will inform you what can be, according to the text. Even on condition that a man be naturally dead, as was Lazarus, he can be in spirit, at the same time, a true believer; and though one should remain any limited time in unbelief, while thus dead;--Yet, if Christ shall make him believe, he shall as certainly live, spiritually, although naturally dead. . . ." Answer, as they had been men in the flesh, living in all manner of wickedness, even so after death, being spirits in prison, they must first be judged according to what kind of men they had been in the flesh, in order to save them from all their former sins in the flesh. . . . Then, what is meant by living according [sic] to God in the spirit? Ans. To live godly in Christ Jesus, is living according to God. And to live so in the spirit, implies they were not men in the flesh, but in the spirit, as God is a spirit. . . . "Ques. What kind of prison were those spirits in; before they were liberated?--Was it like a located, dark dungeon, a particular place of confinement? "Ans. I do not think it is so to be understood; but it refers to the state of mind they were in; contracted, and shut up in their understanding, they were confined as to a knowledge of God and his righteousness. . . . Nature of Source: A religious bi-weekly publication mainly promoting the Universalist doctrine. In addition to articles on religion and on the activities of Universalist societies, it included sermons, Bible studies, poetry, anecdotes, and a good deal of selected material, especially from Universalist magazines.

Comment: Here reprinted from the Christian Intelligencer, the contextual article is a satirical commentary on a pamphlet called A sermon for the Rich to buy, that they may benefit Themselves and the Poor written by one Rev. Ezra Styles Ely which uses scriptural exegesis to support its request for the donation of money "for the salvation of perishing immortal souls" (63). The excerpted portion is purportedly taken from Rev. Ely's pamphlet. Those referred to as having a lesser portion in heaven are the wealthy who are stingy with the distribution of their wealth.

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "If they are found in heaven, you will find them among a company scarcely saved: among the vessels of small size, which contain but little grace. They are the GILL MEASURES of heaven.

"There is a higher and a lower seat in heaven; but although it would be bliss to abide forever on the threshold of glory, yet he is a mean spirited believer, who would not humble aspire to eminence among the luminaries that surround the throne of God" (64).
Comment: The editor is here taking occasion to comment on a sermon given by a Methodist minister called "Mr. S" who used Heb. 3:2,3 to try to refute the doctrine of universal salvation. Mr. S. had preached that "eternal" punishment was indeed without end but that it would differ in degree according to the righteousness or wickedness of the individual. The editor of the Examiner rejects this doctrine on the grounds that any judgment of men by their works denies the grace of Christ. (Compare Joseph Smith's doctrine of heavenly degrees in D&C 76.)

Researcher: Timothy Robinson

Excerpt (pages): "There is another singular sentiment that Mr. S. advanced which merits inspection. From what he called an objection of 'some that sinners will be delivered from punishment when they have suffered to the full amount of their wickedness, and consequently punishment will not be endless,' he observed that, 'this argument would also go to prove that the happiness of the saints in heaven will have an end also; for when they are rewarded to the amount of their good works, they will have no right to a further continuance in heaven.' Therefore concluded 'that rewards and punishments in a future state will be proportioned by degrees of happiness and misery, and not by periods of time.' This indeed is a very curious picture of the world. If this be true degrees of happiness and misery, move by almost imperceptible steps from the lowest hell, to the highest heaven. . . . Although this picture looks perfectly visionary and fabulous, yet it irresistibly involves itself in the doctrine for which so many contend, that man will be punished and rewarded in a future state according to the deeds done in the body: For none will dispute that there are different and a vast variety of degrees of righteousness and wickedness.--But what surprises us in the supporters of this doctrine, who expect to go to heaven themselves, is, their frequent confessions that, if justice was done to them, they would long ago, have been in hell among the damned. . . . If misery and happiness in a future state, are in exact proportion to their evil and good deeds in the body, grace is out of the question" (156, italics his).

Comment: This excerpt is set in a broader discussion of the corruption of the Bible by the "deception" of its translators which likens the Bible to a tree. The deceiving "husbandmen" have grafted false branches into the tree but their deception is discerned by observing the fruit of the branches for the trunk of the tree is love. Although the scriptures-as-tree metaphor dominates the discussion, there is a marked shift here at the end of the article where the author begins to equate the love of God with what he calls the "tree of life."

The "pure river of the waters of life" comes from Rev. 22:1, where the image of the "tree of life" is used in a more generalized, symbolic way than in the Book of Genesis ("the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations"--Rev. 22:2), however this author's usage of the "tree of life" to represent the love of God seems preminiscent of Lehi's conception of the "tree of life" in the 1Nephi 8.

Accordingly I went to a secret place, & began my secret prayer. I continued I should say not much more than one hour, when I was broken off by a still, small voice, the words were plainly articulated and realized, and were as follows: 'Your motive is from selfish principles, for fear of future and endless misery; you always have been and now are excited to pray from the same false motives.' Believing without a shadow of a doubt that this was the voice of God to me, I took great encouragement, thinking I had now learned my mistake and how to pray in future acceptably. I instantly renewed my petition (which was) that God would grant me to pray with a good and holy motive that might be heard. By this time I was interrupted again with the same voice which said, 'what are you doing noew better than before? Your motives are the same as before--you wish for holy motives to escape the torments of hell.' Then for the first time I was thoroughly convicted that I could do nothing towards regenerating myself not so much as to think one good thought. Here I entirely gave myself up seeking any more, but found I lay at the mercy of God to dispose of as he say fit. But a great alm overspread my mind and my passions all subsided. Instantly I say a vision, as it appeared to me. I was alking a straight road with a celestial guide at my right hand. The sun appeared to be about thow hours high in the morning, shining thfough a hazy cloud, cast a beautiful red and yellow color on the ground. I say a sone wall on the right hand not quite findished; and I saw a stone lying on the ground near the wall suitable to help finsh the wall, here we stopt [sic]; my guide said to me, 'by what means will this sone ever get placed into this wall?' I answered, 'if the owner of the premises judged the stone fit for the building and is self-moved to put it into the wall, it will be done; otherwise it never will.' My guide said that I had answered discreetly, and then said to me, 'thou art as that stone & you can do no more toward influencing God to put you into his building, than this stone can the owner to aly it into this wall; and you (said he) was [sic] placed by unerring wisdom into God's uilding before the foundation of the world.' . . .
importance to me was in a vision of the night when deep sleep had fallen upon me. It appeared to me that I was suddenly awaked [sic] at the west end of a straight path, in a very thick wilderness where the trees were so thick behind me and at my right and left hand that I could see but a few steps any way, except to the east where the light shone in its usual brightness as far as my eyes could reach. The ground was almost level where I stood, and kept a gradual ascent until near the east end of the road where growing steeper it readen to the top of a mountain, over which the clear sky appeared. The road through the wilderness was as straight as a line, not a single branch from the forest hung over the strait [sic] and arrow way which was about twenty feet wide and filled with small bushes; except in the middle of the road was a foot path just wide enough for one person to walk in. In this was neither briars nor bushes, nor any thing to stumble over, not the least crook in it from one end to the other. At the west end of this road, I found myself as one just brought into existence with a celestial friend holding me erect on my feet by the right arm. . . . He informed me that it was the straight and narrow way that led to mount zion; and that I had no strength only what I received when I was brought into it: then putting a staff into my right hand which he called faith, without which, said he, 'you can neither stand nor go.' Then letting go my right arm bid me walk, saying 'we walk by faith and not by sight.' . . . Then casting my eyes to the ground I discovered new tracks of travellers; I knew whose they were, and they were all Baptists. Then I was careful to step into their tracks. My guide soon admonished me for it . . . 'you must follow no man any further (said he) tho' they follow Christ, if you continue so doing you will soon get out of this way, and will again be lost in the wilderness. Now (said he) I will shew you the mark, on which if you keep your eyes you will never lose the way,' and pointing to the east he shewed me a bright light directly over the middle of the top of Mount Zion, resembling the sun through a foggy cloud. . . . Thus fixing my eyes on the mark I travelled with great delight and more speed for a considerable distance although the ascent gained, yet I arose more in advancing one step now, than in many when I first set out. . . . I then cast my eyes on the ground to see whether I could discover any [sic] new tracks . . . as I was then fast ascending the hill of Zion. And I saw no sign of any recent traveller. Then I said to my guide (which had kept at my right hand to give my all the information necessary for the journey and guide me into all truth) 'I see no footsteps of the Baptists thus far advanced. He replied no, the Baptists have never travelled so far as this. They are all at present in wilderness between this and the place where we first set out. Their carcasses have fallen in the wilderness as many of the children of Israel did.' . . . I arrived at the summit of the mountain. Here we stopped when I viewed with great transport and delight the sun which ad lighted me all the way, and the beautiful situation of the mountain for delights, when my guide exclaimed with an Emphasis 'this is o less than the house of God and the Gate of Heaven.' At this I instantly awoke with joyful surprise the words still sounding in my ears for a long time" (185-7).

"In a vision of the night when deep sleep had fallen upon me, it appeared to me I was walking out alone where I met a beautiful personage, and as he drew night to me, he made himself known that he was Jesus the Christ of God; and unspeakable grace, mercy, meekness, mildness, loving kindness, gentleness and compassion, beamed in his countenance; and his voice to me was that of a charmer" (Vol. 2, No. 25, p. 197).

"I expected at least he would reprove me for some remissness [sic] or fault, but not the least reproof did I hear. But with the sociability of an equal, and all the tenderness and pity of a tender mother to a young child did he converse with me. He took two small portions of food resembling corn and gave me, eat sufficiently of it thyself; and of it feed my sheep and lambs, and it will never exhaust, it will be sufficient for thee at all times.--I took it nothing doubting that he had sent me to preach his gospel. . . ." (Vol. 2, No. 26. p. 201).

Comment: A colorful account of a dream/vision of Hell, the judgment of the wicked by God, and God's freeing of the captive souls and shutting of the gates of Hell. Learned ministers of other faiths are condemned to misery for having preached a doctrine of punishment and woe instead of the gospel of mercy ("by that judgment ye judge, so ye shall be judged"). Anti-proselytism sentiment is expressed: those who "refused to become promoters of their several creeds." There is an incidental reference to Zion.
Researcher: Timothy Robinson
Excerpt (pages): "... the slumbers of the night came over my soul and I fell into the following dream. . . . I beheld a lake which in prophetic days might have been denominated Tophet, but in modern times it is called the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. . . . From the centre of this lake there arose a mighty image to such a height that its head appeared to occupy a middle space between heaven and earth. Endless misery was engraved upon his forehead--mystery was written upon its breast--damnation on the right arm and everlasting punishment on the left. . . . Over this gloomiest of regions there reigned a prince. . . . called Diabolus--the Devil. . . . It hath been asserted by one who is a professed watchman upon the walls of Zion that the parent of mercies, the giver of every good and perfect gift would spit fire and brimstone from his mouth to kindle the flames of hell. . . . I heard a voice so loud and terrible that it crept into the farthest recesses of the mountains and shook the pillars of creation. The mandate was, come to judgment. At the sound I turned and saw one like unto the son of man seated upon a throne wearing a crown upon the sides of which were written justice, judgment and mercy. Upon the front was engraved the following I am Jesus the root and offspring of David--the bright and morning star. . . . And I looked again and beheld a very great company coming from the east and west--the north and south and from going to and fro in the earth. . . . The following are a specimen of the characters placed at the commencement and termination of their names. Rt. Hon. Rev.--D.D.--A.B.P.--B.D.--S.S.P. &c. . . . On investigation it was found that without regard to age or sex, they had dealt damnation round the land and threatened with an endless expulsion from the mansions of heaven all who would not conform to certain prescribed rules, or refused to become promoters of their several creeds and confessions of faith. . . . And as they had adjudged many as deserving everlasting misery and had measured out fire and brimstone to the inhabitants of the earth, so the like measure was to be meted to them again. . . . Again I beheld until one like unto the ancient of days came near and smote the Prince that Old Serpent and Satan, and the Image that arose out of the midst of the Lake fell. The Lake was dried up, and the seat of Satan's kingdom was annihilated. . . . The captives were delivered, and after being washed in that inexhaustible fountain that is open for Judah and Jerusalem, they were clothed in robes of linen, clean and white" (18-19).

Nature of Source: Smith wrote a New Testament Dictionary for the purpose of showing the original meanings of words so he could disavow every un-Christian tradition (as he saw it) that had been imported into primitive Christianity.

Comments: After giving a straightforward definition of the word atonement, Smith comments on what he thinks Christ's atonement means.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "Much is now said of a special and particular atonement, general atonement, universal atonement, with many such things not mentioned in the Scriptures. Some say Christ has atoned the deity, paid a debt for the Elect, or all the world, appeased the wrath of God,--and some--, that Christ died to reconcile God to man, with many such unscriptural things. The fact is, God is the same now as before Christ came. God was love, or he had never given his Son, that men might believe in him, and be saved. The atonement is as extensive as men are reconciled to God, and no more so. The propitiation, or medium of reconciliation, is as extensive as the whole world, or the gospel could not be preached to every creature, nor could all men be justly commanded to repent. As much as we are reconciled to God, so much we share in the fulness of Christ, and no more. In this way, men are saved, and all who remain unreconciled, remain unsaved, and so must forever remain." Comments: Smith explains the etymology of the word Bishop and explains that the office of Bishop must be one of service and not one of financial remuneration. He explains that the offices of Bishop and Elder are the same.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "This word is from the Saxon word Bishop, and that from a Greek word which means an Overseer, or Inspector. Before the time of the Apostles, the word was used by the Athenians, to mean such as they sent into the provinces to subject them, and to see whether every thing was kept in order. The Romans gave the same title to those who were inspectors and visitors of the bread and provision. In the New Testament it means one who has the oversight and care of that which belongs to himself or another. It is something very different from that which the Catholics, Episcopalians, and Methodists mean when they say The Bishop." (88-89).
"The New Testament speaks of two orders of Bishops, one above the other, or one having the whole care and command of all the others."
"1. Jesus Christ is the first, or the Bishop over all his Bishops"
"2. All the faithful ministers of Christ who are ordained to take the oversight of the flock of God, are Bishops, or Elders, which is the same. Christ told the Apostles they were all brethren and their office was equal: no one was above another. The law concerning the ministers of Christ stands the same now as then." (89).

Nature of Source: This text is a statement on the New Testament church presented to the "Elders and brethren, who compose the Christian Conference."
Comments: The contents of this short work detail various beliefs and practices found in the New Testament church. Because Smith and his associates were primitivists, this book attempts to describe the tenets of their Christian faith. In this book they also articulate their desire to go by the name of Christian; all other denominational names, they argue, are unscriptural.

"No man can be a bishop, unless he is a spiritual man; because his office is spiritual: and the natural man doth not understand the things of the spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him. . . He must have experience--not a novice. His work is to preach the word--to feed the flock of God over which the Holy Ghost has made him an overseer" (13).

Comments: Elias Smith, in his twelfth sermon, argues that there will be an annual conference of most of the nations of the world during Christ's millennial reign. He compares the necessity of this conference with the Presbyterian and Methodist conferences of his own day.
This by some may be thought a thing incredible; but the situation of the nations of the earth at that time, will require that all nations, or at least that some of all nations, I behalf of the rest, should meet at the seat of government for the benefit of the whole" (154).

"At the time when there shall be one Lord and his NAME one; all those party distinguishing names and meetings will be overpowered by the glorious name christian" (155).

"This annual meeting, like the sun which overpowers all other lights, will overpower all the little annual meetings of the different religious denominations, and all the annual meetings of states, kingdoms, and Empires in the world" (155).

Comments: A sermon concerning the Government of Christ, based on Isaiah 9:6 "And the Government shall be upon his shoulder." Smith discusses several Biblical passages to establish the nature of Christ's reign on earth. When he discusses the terms liberty, equality, unity, peace he searches (rhetorically) other kingdoms on earth to find a pattern in them. He argues that the government of the United States is the only government on earth to exhibit the qualities expected in Christ's kingdom. In this excerpt, Smith extols the virtues of Presidents Washington and Jefferson, noting that they are men of God.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "When the first President was placed in the chair, it was considered of God, that such a government should be adopted and such a man as GEORGE WASHINGTON appointed to preside as chief magistrate in the union. (31)

The nature of the constitution and articles of confederation and perpetual union, and the manner in which it was adopted is a striking proof of its being of God. (32)

It appears to me that George Washington was a Magistrate appointed by Christ, to be a praise to them who do well, and that he meant to do justly as a magistrate... John Adams, I consider, as a four years scourge to the United States; who, by his retrograde motion, taught the Americans that they had something to do in order to enjoy the blessings of the righteous government which the second Adam had given them. By his administration, the people found that the third Adam's notion of government was very different from that of the second Adam.

Our present President, Thomas Jefferson, was raised up by the King of kings to fill the most important place in the world; and though Christ took Washington away; yet he spared Jefferson, whose name will ever be held in high esteem by all who love liberty, equality, unity, and peace.

I do not thing there ever was a chief magistrate so qualified as he is. Is ideas of government and religion accord with the laws of the King of kings. (34-35)

The present situation of our affairs, as to the chief magistrate in our government, is worthy of notice. I think Mr. Jefferson is the first magistrate that has ever come forward and not only told the world that magistrates had no right to interfere in the priestly government of Christ; but in four years administration, he had proved that he did not wish to bind men's souls. In that time they have found that he has no thought of destroying religion.

I believe that God has raised up Mr. Jefferson for the Americans as he raised up Cyrus for the Jews..." (75).

I may be called enthusiastic by the present generation when I say, I believe Thomas Jefferson is the angel who poured out his vial upon the river Euphrates, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared; but future generations will see that this is true. (77).

The question is, what is righteousness in a government? I answer it is 1. Liberty, 2. Equality, 3. Unity, 4. Peace. The government which Christ set up in this world, when he was here, had these four things in it. These four things he preached, and called men to attend to them. He said his kingdom was not of this world; it was not founded nor governed upon unrighteous principles. He told his hearers that the kingdom or government of God had righteousness in it. (23).
Where shall we find a people under such a government as this? all the churches, in the days of the apostles, were under this heavenly government: they appeared one vast republic on earth! all free, all equal, all united, all at peace among themselves, and striving for peace among those with whom they lived. The apostles were servants in the churches; so were the other ministers. No one had dominion over the faith of another. Where shall we find this government now? . . . In the United States of America.

The constitution of the United States, is founded on that righteousness which consists in Liberty, Equality, Unity, and Peace. This is the first and only government on earth of the kind. This begun first in Providence (Rhode island) and has now become the general government of this country.
I suppose that some may be unwilling to own that the government of this country is the kingly government of Christ; and it is likely that the idea will be new to many; but it is a fact. . ." (26-27).

Excerpt (pages):

"I am to prove the government of this country to be the kingly government of Christ, from the constitution and articles of confederation, which are adopted in this country by a majority of people" (27).

"Liberty, is the first thing in the government of Christ. This is one thing peculiar to the constitution of the United States" (28).

"Equality, is another thing peculiar to the kingly government of Christ. This part of it is in the constitution of this country. We have no lords spiritual, nor lords temporal: such a class of men as the nobility, are not known here, but all these unrighteous distinctions are swallowed up in the term fellow citizens. Privileged classes, who do nothing, and live idly on the hard earnings of others, are not found here. (29)

Unity is another part of Christ's government. This is peculiar to the government of this country. On this account, the stile of our confederacy is this "the United States of America" (29).

Peace is another thing peculiar to the government of Christ. This is found in the government of this country. As righteousness is the nature of the government; so peace is the certain attendant of it" (30).

"This government, considered in the nature of the constitution, and the articles of confederation between the States, is the wonder of the world! This is a government different from all others on earth: it is from heaven." (30-31).

"When the first President was placed in the chair, it was considered of God, that such a government should be adopted, and such a man as George Washington appointed to preside..." (31).

Elders "were employed in preaching to the people" (186)
They "had the oversight or care of the temporal affairs of the church" (186)
"The word is used in the New Testament to describe the public men or officers in the church of Christ, who preach, or act for and in behalf of the church. It is a name which belongs to all the faithful ministers of the Christ, who are ordained to that office, and one is not allowed a pre-eminence above another." (186).

Publisher: Elias Smith

Date of Publication: June 9, 1809

Nature of Source: The Herald of Gospel Liberty is probably America's first religious newspaper. In this biweekly periodical, edited by Elias Smith, articles typically focus on the nature of religious freedom in America, the quest for the primitive church, the signs of the times, and the millennium.

Comments: The "Liberty" series addresses several aspects of what Liberty means to a Christian. In this article, Smith begins by discussing that the liberty of the primitive church was short lived because there was a falling away. He does not wish to see a similar falling away in his own time, thus the constant emphasis on liberty in his newspaper.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "The liberty which the primitive church enjoyed in the days of the Apostles, though glorious, was not of long continuance, by reason of the falling away from the doctrine of the Apostles, according to the prophecy of the Apostle Paul" (80).

"After the death of the apostles, the spirit which began to work in the day of John and Paul, shewed itself openly in the alterations that were made. In their day, the Presbyters, or Elders, laboured in the churches, in perfect harmony, nor did they stand in need of a President or Superior, to maintain concord and order where no dissentions were known. But the number of Elders and Deacons increasing with that of the churches, they appointed an assembly of Presbyters, over which they appointed a presbyter to preside, in order to distribute among his colleagues their several tasks. . . and to be as was supposed a centre of union to the whole society. This was the first departure from the order left by the apostles" (80).

"There was another thing which took place, after they departed from the faith, which took away the liberty of the people. These bishops told the people that the ministers of the christian church, succeeded to the character, rights, and privileges of the Jewish priesthood, and this was a new source of honour and profit to this order of men. The Patriarchs considered themselves as invested with a rank and character similar to those of the high priests among the Jews, which the Presbyters represented the priests; and the deacons the levites. This notion once introuced, produced pernicious effects, which have been felt by the people to this day, as it has established in the minds of the people a greater difference between the ministers and people, than the law of Christ allows" (80).

Title of Periodical: The Alethian Critic; or Error Exposed by an Exhibition of Truth Vol 1 no. 1 Place of Publication: Lexington, Kentucky.
Publisher: D. Bradford
Date of Publication: April, 1804
Nature of Source: Religious periodical of the Halcyon Church of Christ in Columbia, also called the Millennium Church. This radical protestant religion has a strict belief in monotheism and millennialism, and believes the Urim and Thummim central to their religion.
Comment: This article refutes the immortality of the devil, death, and hell, arguing that the doctrine of endless misery is blasphemous, because God is the source of salvation, not damnation. It explains that God cannot become all in all unless the devil, death, and damnation, are only temporary conditions.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "The terms everlasting punishment, in the Greek, are rendered 'AIONIAN PUNISHMENT.' That is the punishment of the ages. Now this cannot be expressive of endless duration, BECAUSE there are no periods, or ages, in eternity. Eternity is one eternal now..." (15)
"the idea of immortal death--immortal misery and of an immortal devil, appear as contradictory in themselves, when we call into view the true nature of things..." (16)
"It is a privation of immortality that gives birth to misery and death..."(16)
"The devil, disorder, misery, death, or hell, are not EFFECTS proceeding from or supported by an eternal cause, and therefore, cannot in the nature of things be ENDLESS in their existence..."(17).
"There is not one word of endless misery in all the law. No! nor one moment's future misery!!" (23)
"The doctrine of endless misery, in its nature, is repugnant to both law and gospel" (25).
"...The doctrine of endless misery tends to vilify the character of God and his dear son, to invalidate and scandalize the sacred writings, to render the christian name contemptible, to defame all revealed religion, and to set up a false religion in place of the true..." (29)

The cause of the punishment of the wicked at the last days in this; disobeying the gospel of Jesus Christ.

All men are in one situation by nature. . . As it is written, there is none righteous, no, not one. . . "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God. These verses show that all nations are in one situation; all sinners. What sin have they committed? They have hated the light which God hath given them. . . Their sin is unbelief.

All those places which speak of Christ's giving himself a ransom for all; being a propitiation for the sins of the whole world; being the Saviour of the world, have reference to the atonement, which is of such a nature as to open a way to proclaim peace and pardon to all the guilty, which is all the world; and to proclaim to them the acceptable year of our God; and to all who refuse to obey, the day of vengeance is declared, in the most solemn manner." (9-10).
Nature of Source: This collection of sermons represents ten years of Elias Smith's thinking on the subject of the fulfillment of Biblical prophecy respective to the millennium.

Comments: Smith's fifteenth sermon relates all the various meanings of hell at the time. He discusses in particular the hell of the pagans, the "Mahometans," the "Papists," the Protestants, and the scriptural hell.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "Whenever there are a variety of opinions concerning any matter, there is always some truth at the bottom. All these different notions concerning hell, is an evidence that there is something true about it: that truth is in the scriptures" (193).

Hell: "1. It is described as a place of confinement and torment"

2. "Hell is described as a place of torment before the last day"

3. "Hell is described as a place where the souls and bodies of the wicked will be destroyed, and where the angels which sinned will be destroyed with them" (193-194).

The scriptures "speak plainly of the soul and body being destroyed in hell" (194).

In this biweekly periodical, edited by Elias Smith, articles typically focus on the nature of religious freedom in America, the quest for the primitive church, the signs of the times, and the millennium.

Comments: Smith refutes infant baptism because it makes no distinction between the world and the church. He compares lack of uniformity in baptism to lack of uniformity in a company of soldiers.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "The design of Scripture baptism is to make a distinction between the world and the church, infant baptism makes no distinction. Therefore infant baptism is not the one baptism designed to make the distinction between the world and the church. These propositions must stand unless some person can prove that infant baptism makes a distinction between the world and the church, and is a command given by the head of the Church" (36).

Nature of Source: This sermon details Elias Smith's belief in baptism. He believed in baptism by immersion and found infant baptism unscriptural. At the end of his sermon, he provides a brief history of infant baptism to show how it developed in the church. As is typical of Smith, he traces the subject of infant baptism as far back as he could so he could prove it unscriptural.

Comments: Much of Smith's history of infant baptism seems to be researched, though he certainly argues his own point of view with all of his evidence. Toward the end of his history he details the condition of baptism in his own time, lamenting that infant baptism was not only on the rise among the religious of his day, but that there were so many accepted ways of doing it.

Excerpt (pages): "In this century baptism has almost as many shapes as imagination can paint; particularly, what they call infant baptism. The clergy have worked it something as the Boy did his ice, when he undertook to warm it. Just at the time when he thought it was warm, it had turned to hot water: so it is with infant baptism, it is almost warmed out of sight."

"When I was in New Bedford last May, it was said that one who had been sprinkled in infancy, wished to be sprinkled again. The first sprinkling was nothing, the second was like it; nothing and nothing from nothing.--nothing remains three naughts [o, o, o]." (34)

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Exeter, N.H.
Publisher: Henry Ranlet
Date of Publication: 1805
Library Location: Early American Imprints Evans microfiche 9367
Nature of Source: This is one of Elias Smith's many published sermons on the subject of the millennium.
Comments: In this excerpt, Elias Smith discusses the punishment of the wicked at the day of judgment. He believed that the wicked would be annihilated at the last day and suggest his readers will correct him if the extent of this destruction is something less than such, "If this is not the meaning, I hope some one will shew me to the contrary" (30). He also provides a warning to the wicked.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "Another circumstance peculiar to the day of judgment is this, the punishment of the wicked; for, "though hand join in hand, they shall not go unpunished." The punishment of the wicked will be after they have had their trial at the day of judgment. . . the everlasting punishment of the wicked is expressed in such strong, and plain terms, that there is no room left to dispute it, unless we dispute the plain declarations of the word of God. This punishment of the ungodly is called "the second death."
It is proper now to describe the nature of the punishment which the ungodly will receive at the last day.
It must be one of three things;--either a state of miserable existence without end;--or a state of punishment for a certain period, and then to be delivered from it and made happy;--or, such a punishment as will destroy their existence, so that they will cease to be. (25).

[After discussing the different sides of these three beliefs in how the wicked will be punished] "These are only a few of the many places which speak of the destruction of the wicked. This destruction is called the second death. When the body dies, it has an end as to this world; and Christ speaks of the souls being killed, and of the soul and body being destroyed in hell. "The soul that sins shall die."
I do not publish this as my belief; but as the thoughts which have passed through my mind while reading these places of scripture." (26-28)

Comments: Though this excerpt doesn't suggest a physical place of refuge against the destruction of the wicked at the last day, it does suggest how Elias Smith considered the only means of refuge: repentance. He had no plans to prepare his followers for the calamity of the last days to speak of beyond this.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "Permit me, my friends, to address you in a few words on this important and solemn subject. Those of you who have heard this description of the last day, and those who may read after it is printed, are by this called upon to attend now to the things which belong to your peace, before they are hid from your eyes. Remember, O unbeliever, that you are condemned already, and the wrath of God abides on you. Think O sinner! what an awful scene is before you--death you cannot avoid--you must rise at the last day. If you do such an evil as to live impenitent, and reject the Saviour, you will then rise to the resurrection of damnation. You cannot stand in the judgment, but must go away into everlasting punishment, even everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. Christless souls, seek the Lord while he may be found. "Repent ye, and turn yourselves from all your transgressions, and so iniquity shall not prove your ruin." (34).

Smith devotes several of his sermons to the subject of the return of the Jews to their native land as part of God's fulfillment of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In this selection from Smith's fourth sermon, he explains the conditions of the world at the time the Jews will be restored. He explains that the Jews will be safely gathered to their homeland.

Excerpt (pages): "1. At the time when the Jews shall return to their land, it is mentioned that the nations of the earth will bee in a distressed, dark situation, and that the Jews shall have prosperity, which will cause the Gentiles to come to the Jews and their prosperity" (45).

"2. It is mentioned that the Gentiles will assist the Jews in returning to their land" (45).

"3. That when they return, the wealth of the nations will be gathered to that land" (45).

"4. It is said that the other nations shall come to help in building the walls of their cities". . . (45).

Comments: Elias Smith was very much a literalist in his readings of Biblical prophecy. In this excerpt from his fifth sermon, he explains the conditions of Jerusalem in his day and speculates that Napoleon may be the one to restore the Jews to the promised land.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "It appears to me from the present situation of things among the Turks, and Jews, that the nation of France and some leader will lead the Jews into the promised land. It is possible that Bonaparte may be the man. He has been engaged in war against the Turks in Egypt, he has assembled the Jews in Paris, and showed them such favours as no other king has since Titus led them away captive. I think it altogether likely that as a Gentile led them out of their land, (Titus the Roman) so a Gentile will be their head to lead them back. They may think the man who leads them into their land to be the Messiah. The Jews have of late endeavored to prove that the Emperor of France is a descendant of David" (66).

Comments: These excerpts from Smith's eighth sermon illustrate Smith's position on the work Christ will come to do. He explains that he once believed the governments of the earth would be destroyed before the coming of Christ, but that now he believes that part of Christ's work on the earth will be to destroy human governments and human religions.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "I once thought that all the government on earth, contrary to Christ's, would be overthrown, before Christ came to reign on the earth; but a better knowledge of the scriptures constrains me to give up the belief as unscriptural" (99). "I believe it will not be done until he comes and dwells on this earth, where he once came and did the work no other man could do. The work he then had to do, could not have been done, had he not appeared in flesh, for if it could have been done he would have remained in glory; the work he says, he will do hereafter requires him here in person. When this great army of all the kings of the earth are destroyed, then, and not till then, will all human governments, and human religions come to nothing" (99).

Comments: Elias Smith debates some of the current beliefs about Melchizedek
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "The question is often asked, Who was Melchizedek? He was a man, who lived in Salem, now called Jerusalem. According to Paul's explanation, the word Melchizedek signifies righteousness, and the word Salem means peace. Christ is said to be a priest after the order of Melchizedek, who was a righteous, peacable king; and at the same time while he ruled on the throne, he was a priest of the most high God, to offer sacrifices, and pray for the people. There is no other man mentioned in the scriptures, who was king and priest at the same time. It is thought by many that Melchizedek was not a man. It is as certain that he was a man, as it is certain that Aaron was a man. The account of him in Genesis is proof of it. . . He set forth bread and wine before Abraham. . . this proves him a man. . . Paul calls him a great man. There are several things mentioned in Hebrews, which lead many people to conclude Melchizedek was not a man. It is said, Chap viii, verse 3, that he was "without father, without mother, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually. This is easily reconciled. Paul is not speaking of Melchizedek as a man, but as a priest: as a man he had a father, mother, descent, beginning of days, and end of life. The priests under the law all descended from Aaron, who was a priest. If they could not prove that their father and mother were both of the tribe of Levi, they had no right to the priesthood. Melchizedek had no father who was priest before him: his being without descent, means that he did not descend from priests or from the tribe of Levi.
It is said he was without beginning of days, or end of life. The meaning of this is, that there was no particular time in his life when he should enter into his priestly office or go out of it. The priests under the law entered into their office at a certain age, and went out at a certain age. This was a limited priesthood; Melchizedek had an unlimited priesthood, which pointed to Christ, whose priesthood is unlimited and unchangeable. Christ is said to be after the order of melchizedek; but if Melchizedek means Christ, then he is a priest after the order or similitude of himself; this would be nonsense." (60-61).

Nature of Source: Smith wrote a New Testament Dictionary for the purpose of showing the original meanings of words so he could disavow every un-Christian tradition (as he saw it) that had been imported into primitive Christianity.
Comments: This entry is similar to other writings Smith wrote on the subject of Melchizedek. Smith contends against those who argue that Melchizedek is not a man because the scriptures suggest that he is without beginning of days or end of years. Smith explains that this refers to Melchizedek's priesthood which is unlimited and is, therefore, a type of Christ's priesthood.
It should be mentioned that Smith makes some discussion about Christ being after the order of Melchizedek; he argues that Christ cannot be after the order of Melchizedek because Melchizedek is a type of Christ and Christ cannot be a type of himself. Smith never seems to reconcile this conflict any further.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm

There is no other man mentioned in the scriptures, who was king and priest at the same time." (60).
"Melchizedek had an unlimited priesthood, which pointed to Christ, whose priesthood is unlimited and unchangeable" (61).
"I here mention a few particulars in which Christ is a priest after the order of Melchizedek.
1. Melchizedek was a king of righteousness and king of peace. So is Christ. Isaiah xxxii.2.
2. Melchizedek was king and priest; so is Christ a priest upon his throne, and a great high priest on the right hand of God.
3. Melchizedek had no relation before him, nor any after him that were priests; he did not receive his priesthood from man, nor leave it to any man, it begun and continued with him; so it is with Christ"
4. Melchizedek was a great man and a great priest; greater than Abraham whom he blest. So Christ the high priest is great. . . greater than Melchizedek.
5. Melchizedek set bread and wine before Abraham when he was returning from the slaughter; so Christ the high priest does; he set bread and wine before his disciples with his own hands the night in which he was betrayed, and now in that ordinance he does it by his ministers, to all who eat the bread and drink the wine discerning the Lord's body.
7. Melchizedek received tithes of Abraham; this showed that Abraham belonged to his kingdom. Christ receives a tribute of praise from all who submit to him, and their giving to him the glory due to his name, shews that they are entitled to his protection. (61-62).

Excerpt (pages): "The wicked will share in the second death, which cannot be unless there is a first death, and the righteous in a second life, which is without end. All who confessed Christ before men who believed on him here, obeyed him, and left all for him, will enjoy all that God can bestow, in one eternal state of glory and joy. These will enjoy the new heaven and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. The world to come will be theirs; thses being accounted "worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead; will neither marry nor be given in marriage, but will be equal to the angels; being the sons of God and the children of the resurrection." In this pure state they will enjoy the company of the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, and all the redeemed forever. Angels will be their equals, Jesus will ever be their delight, God their glory and light forever. Mortality will put on immortality. . . satan will cease to tempt. . . sin will be no more. . . pains, groans, tears, and death will be at an end forever. Their robes will be forever white. . . their harps ever tuned. . . their song will be ever new, and their deathless tongues will be eternally employed in praising him "who loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood." Time and changes will then be over forever, and one uninterrupted scene of glory and joy will be the portion of the followers of the Lamb world without end, Amen. (31).

When we realize the evidences of a judgment to come, every earthly object disappears, as candles cease to shine when their faint light is overpowered by the bright shining of the sun. Ah! what are all these momentary trifles of time, when the great day is described to a thinking mind! they are like the vanished shadow--like the faded flower--like the visions of the night when we awake; they are viewed no more. (31)
The reward of the righteous at the resurrection of the just, will be unspeakably great. At that day, their bodies being raised incorruptible, they will reign with Christ the second Adam forever." (34).

This looks rational to me. Whether it will be so or not, we are certain that the body of fire must be very great which shall melt the elements, and dissolve all these things which we see! After this fire the earth will be in a suitable situation for the SECOND ADAM and his children to dwell in; being the new heaven and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Nature of Source: This is one of Elias Smith's many published sermons on the subject of the millennium.
Comments: Elias Smith discourses on some of the events that must take place before the second coming and the millennium. I will list these events rather than include the full excerpts.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): 1. The Jews must be carried captive and "sifted as with a sieve among all nations to this day, and they are "without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice. . .
2. The prince of darkness. . . would endeavor to overthrow Christ's kingdom or church and that all their exertion would be in vain
3. Early Christianity will fall away into "old heathen practices" and the "man of sin," whom Elias Smith believes to be the Pope will come to power, believing himself to be God.
"This, which was to take place before the second coming of Christ, is already accomplished. Every kind of wickedness which the scriptures say should be done by the son of perdition has been done."
4. There will be signs in the heavens--Smith documents the signs appearing in New England, pointing specifically to appearances of the northern lights.
5. The Jews will return to their native land and come to believe in Christ. (10-13)
6. The final destruction of antichrist
7. The day of judgment

Nature of Source: Smith wrote a New Testament Dictionary for the purpose of showing the original meanings of words so he could disavow every un-Christian tradition (as he saw it) that had been imported into primitive Christianity.

Comments: Elias Smith frequently attacked both child baptism and baptism by sprinkling. Though he tends to be repetitive on these issues, he is a consistent source of insight on the subject of immersion.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "Baptism, is a word peculiar to the New Testament, and is from Heaven. The first and original meaning of the word is, an overwhelming, dipping, immersing, or burying. The word never means pouring or sprinkling." (71)
"The English translators did not translate the word baptize, and they acted wisely, for there is no one word in the English language, which is an exact counterpart of the Greek word, as the New Testament uses it..." (72)
"The difficulty, or rather the excellence of the word is, that it contains two ideas inclusive of the whole doctrine of baptism" (72).
"The word then conveys two ideas, the one literal dipping; the other figurative, colouring; a figure however expressive of a real fact; meaning that by bathing persons in the river Jordan, conferred a character, as dyers, by dipping in a dying vat set a tinct or colour" (72)

Nature of Source: The Herald of Gospel Liberty is probably America's first religious newspaper. In this biweekly periodical, edited by Elias Smith, articles typically focus on the nature of religious freedom in America, the quest for the primitive church, the signs of the times, and the millennium.

Comments: Smith reports a baptism (by immersion) in Greenland

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "After a short address to the people by the Administrator, he led them one at a time into the water, and buried them in baptism, according to the ancient practice of the Apostles."
"[This was] the first time baptism was ever administered in that place according to the New Testament" (8)

Length of Relevant Material: 1p.
There are some at the present day, who prove by their conduct that they are ignorant of the real meaning of baptism, and yet conclude there is some meaning, and to be certain of the right way, practice in all the variety of fancy invented by those of ancient and modern times. They sprinkle infants, sprinkle adults; pour in a meeting house--pour at the brink of the river--pour with the subject kneeling in the water--pour three times--dip them backwards, dip them forwards, &c. One of these ways must be the right; but ask them which, and they cannot tell" (30).

"Every man acquainted with the Greek language knows, that the original meaning of the word [baptism] is to dip, immerse, bury, or overwhelm in water." (31).

"Native Greeks must understand their language better than foreigners, and that they have always understood the word baptism to signify dipping; and therefore from their first embracing christianity to this day, they have always baptized, and do yet baptize by immersion. This is an authority for the meaning of the word baptize, infinitely preferable to that of European lexicographers" (31).

"The proper answer to the question, how did the Apostles administer baptism, is, by immersion" (31).
This is, in effect, a catechism that instructs readers in all of the doctrines unique to Elias Smith's Christian Connection movement. It is written in question and answer form, the dialogue between "Enquirer" and "Christian."

Comments: The first segment of this catechism is a discussion on what the followers of Christ should be called. Smith believes that all denominational names besides that of Christian are antichristian. Though he is not so much naming a church as he is a movement, his discussion of names is significant.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "Enquirer--What will you do with all the different names by which professors of religion are called, in the present day, such as Roman Catholic, Episcopalian. . . etc"
"Christian--I will leave them to those who love such antichristian names more than the name of Christ and consider them the name of the beast instead of the Lamb" (13).
"Enquirer--What is the meaning of the word church, in the New Testament?"
"Christian--The word signifies a company of believers in Christ, whether male or female, who are born again of the spirit.

Comments: This excerpt, from the sixth enquiry, discusses the significance of ordination by the laying on of hands. It does not relate who has the authority to lay on hands, other than the "church" itself.

"Enquirer--In what manner were elders ordained according to the New Testament?"
"Christian--It was done in a church meeting, by fasting, prayer, and laying hands on them, with giving them the hand of fellowship. . . . This is the simple account of ordaining elders in the New Testament, which is as different from common ordination as Christ is from Antichrist."
"Enquirer--What do you think of the manner of ministers being ordained among the different denominations at the present day?
"Christian--I think and know it to be a part of the man of sin, which belongs to mystery Babylon"

Comments: Elias Smith discusses how Jesus Christ is a great high priest.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): The sacrifice which the high priest made under the law, was for the whole nation. The design of it was to make atonement, so that any person among the Jews, might have an opportunity to come to the high priest, and confess his sins and be forgiven, and share in the intercession of the priest.

The sacrifice whih Christ the great high priest has made, was for the whole world: "He gave himself a ransom for all." The atonement extends as far as the kingly government of Christ; and now on that account, as a priest, he is able to save to the utmost, all who come unto God through him. . . . If any refuse to submit to him, they must die in their sins, and never enter into the holiest where this high priest is gone. This priest intercedes continually in heaven; so that all who come to God through him have the promise of salvation; but those who refuse to believe in him, and to plead his blood for acceptance, must certainly die in their sins" (65).

Comments: Elias Smith was a man who claimed several prophetic dreams in his lifetime. The account of his conversion to Christ is interesting in that it came to him powerfully in the form of a vision from heaven in midday. Though the Savior did not speak to Elias Smith, the impressions Smith received from his experience were deep and profound; however, it must be noted that over the weeks following this vision, Smith wavered and began doubting it ever happened.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): "While in this situation, a light appeared to shine from heaven, not only into my head, but into my heart. This was something very strange to me, and what I had never experienced before. My mind seemed to rise in that light to the throne of God and the Lamb, and while thus gloriously led, what appeared to my understanding was expressed in Rev. 14:1 . . . The Lamb once slain appeared to my understanding, and while viewing him, I felt such love to him as I never felt to any thing earthly. My mind was calm and at peace with God through the Lamb of God. . . . The view of the Lamb on mount Sion gave me joy unspeakable and full of glory. . . . After admiring the glory of the Lamb for some time, I began to think of the situation my body was in, and rose up to return home. Nature of Source: Elias Smith's spiritual autobiography; there is, by the way, no volume two.
Comments: This excerpt describes one of Elias Smith's many dreams. This dream, which followed shortly after Smith's vision of the Savior, features an angel who comes down, tests Smith, and informs him that God had a great work for him to do. As with his earlier vision, this dream influenced Smith, but it didn't sustain him in this quest for salvation.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): About this time, I dreamed that an angel came to me, and said, "you often doubt whether you have passed from death to life, and think if you were as certain of your own conversion as you are of others, you should doubt no more. I am sent to try you and the other two young men, that you may know what your situation is. You and they are to be tried by fire, and those who endure the trial are right, and those who do not will not stand." This gave my mind a shock; yet in my dream told the angel, my wish was to be right, and if I was not so, it was best to know it now. I dreamed that he put two sticks into the ground, and laid a pole across the top of the two, and made a fire under the pole he laid across. After doing this, he took three long pieces of bark, that would go over the pole and each end lie on the ground; when he had done this, he made a fire under one of the pieces which reached it and burnt it off. As it fell he said, such an one is gone, he will fall away. This was one of the young men which gave me such an evidence of being converted. After this he put a fire under the second, which was the way the other young man was to be tried. This soon burnt off, and as it fell he said, the other one would not endure long. This in my dream filled me with great trouble, as I concluded, if these two failed, there was no hope for me; and that I was gone forever. He then put the fire under the third; I stood and saw the blaze touch the bark, so that it was considerable scorched; but before it burnt the angel threw water on, which kept it in that situation till the fire was gone out. When the fire was done, I was in my dream so affected with what had taken place, that I rose from the place where I sat, and wept much at the thought of being the only one of the three that should endure. While in this weeping situation, I dreamed that the angel came to me as I sat weeping, and putting his right hand on my shoulder, he mildly said, "Weep not at this, the Lord has appeared for you, and will preserve you, for he has a great work for you to do in the world." This affected me more than all I had seen before. Being much agitated with what was said and done, I awoke, and was in the same situation that I dreamed of being in. My face was bathed in tears, and my pillow was wet with my weeping" (75-77).

Comments: Shortly after preaching a sermon on the story of Jacob's ladder, Smith has a dream in which he sees the ladder covering the whole earth, suggesting to him that Christ's atonement is far more vast than he originally believed.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "After returning home, being wearied with my journey, I lay down in the afternoon and slept. In my sleep, I dreamed that an angel came and asked me if I meant to preach upon Jacob's ladder the next day. I said, yes. Well, said he, what do you mean to tell the people that ladder is? I said Christ, and to prove it, shall quote them John 1.51. That is right, said he. What more? I shall tell them the length of the ladder, which is so long as to reach from earth to heaven, which describes Christ the Mediator among men, and at the same time with his father. That is right added the angel. He then said, I will ask you one question more. How wide do you think that ladder is? My reply in the dream was: I do not know. It is what never before entered my mind; tell me the width. He answered, it is as wide as the world. When he had said this, I dreamed that he quoted the following places of scripture to prove what he said: John 3.16, Luke 2.30-31.

That part concerning the width of the ladder was new to me, and meditating on it, and the scriptures which the angel mentioned, I concluded that my dream about a dream was true. The next day, in the pulpit, I told the people of Jacob's dream and my own, and was happy in having an whole Saviour to preach to every creature."

Comments: This excerpt is from Smith's introduction to this collection of his sermons on Biblical prophecy. He explains that he believes this collection to be in harmony with what the Holy Ghost would have us understand on the subject. "When the saints are commanded to sanctify themselves, it is meant that they should devote themselves to God who has cleansed them from sin, and made them accepted in Christ" (306).
Much is said by some, of being justified before we are sanctified, and that men may be justified and go to hell, unless they are sanctified afterwards. There is no such thing mentioned in the scriptures; it is an invention. Men are sanctified first; the moment a man is cleansed from sin, that moment God approves of him, or justifies him. . . . We are justified in proportion as we are sanctified, or cleansed from sin and devoted to God."

Comments: On the subject of the corruption of the churches, Elias Smith was a true believer. His comments on the dismal state of Christianity in his day are often quite cutting and humorous. In this excerpt, he cries down the corruptions of sectarian religion. I include this selection because it is fairly typical of Smith's thinking on the subject.
Researcher: Carl Sederholm
Excerpt (pages): It is a happy circumstance that in this country, the magistrates have taken up only the kingly government of Christ; and they have only to deal with men as good citizens, or bad men. Had they undertook to do something about Christ's family government, or to make laws about religion, the quakers and baptists before this time would either had their necks stretched, or their backs made sore to gratify an ungodly set of anti-christian priests.

Some of the clergy are now crying, alas! because I have as much liberty to write and preach the truth concerning Christ's kingly and priestly government, as they have to write in favor of anti-christ's kingly and priestly government, which is drawing its last breath, dying in a consumption [they have seen their best days.]

I expect it will not be long before the clergy will be ashamed of their priesthood, their holy places, or sacred desks, their infant sprinkling, their covenants, their gay attire, and their carrying people to jail, or ordering the collectors to do it. (68).

Nature of Source: This is a collection of printed sermons in which Elias Smith contends with the beliefs of the Calvinists and the Universalists.

Comments: Smith's refutations of the Calvinists and the Universalists are very representative of his thinking. He was constantly involving himself in the discussions on the nature of salvation and, even after he founded the Christian Connection, wavered from time to time into Universalist beliefs. He couldn't come out from under the cloud of Calvinism his whole life; although this collection of sermons is one of his many attempts. I classify this entry under Sectarian Strife because that is probably how Smith would have classified this topic.

Researcher: Carl Sederholm

Excerpt (pages): "All nations allow that there will be some punishment after death; this is allowing there is a crime. All who profess to believe the bible, believe this, excepting some of those called Universalists. Mr. Winchester says, we may as well deny any other part of the bible, as future punishment. What he contended for was, that the punishment after the day of judgment was limited, and would end in the deliverance of the ungodly. Had the bible read exactly opposite to what it does, he might have proved it; but unhappily for him, to make out his system he was obliged to contradict the word of God. Mr. Murray and Dr. Huntington deny future punishment in any sense; and to do this, they are obliged to turn the truth of God into a lie, and thus strengthen the hands of the wicked by promising him life.

Universalism is founded on Calvinism and Arminianism. It is a three-headed monster, the bastard child of it mother Calvinism, and father Arminianism. These two systems are as opposite to each other as a father and mother are, and on this account they have produced this child, which is as different from the scriptures as they are; and they are as different from the scriptures as light is from darkness. When Calvinism and Arminianism are dead, Universalism will be left in the world, a poor orphan monster, and will die for want of friends.

Date of Publication: August 1807

Nature of Source: Religious periodical of the Halcyon Church of Christ in Columbia, also known as the Millennium Church.

Comments: This article focuses differently on the Urim and Thummim than other publications by the same group; this time, they seem to be looking into commentaries on the ancient, Biblical, usage of these terms to explain more deeply their own position. Earlier publications focus more on the numerological aspect of the Urim and Thummim, though this article does articulate some of the more numerological aspects. The editors recognize little is known about the Urim and Thummim. This publication places great importance on the subject, but the religion does not claim to have a physical Urim and Thummim, it appears to be only spiritual/numerological.

Excerpt (pages): "urim signifies lights or explanations; which, as some say, were the ancient teraphims or little human figures; which the priest carried hid in the fold of his robe or gown, and by which he answered the questions of the Jews" (59).

"The Thummim signifies perfections, and is by the septuagint translated Truth" (59).

"There was, as Diodorus Siculus says, a like ceremony much in use with the Egyptians; whose principal minister of Justice carried an image of precious stones about his neck, which was called Truth." (59).

"We know nothing concerning them, but that they were sort of ornaments belonging to the habit of the High-priest by which he gave oracular answers to the people" (59).

"The high-priests of the Jews...received answers by the urim" (60).

"Others take them to be the twelve precious stones in the breast-plate of the High-priest which shone like a flame of fire" (60).

"The Urim and Thummim must be restored and exhibited to the true Israel, before the new and spiritual TEMPLE can be built; because it is the foundation and top stone of the same" (61).

Title of Book: A Sermon, Delivered at Bolton, N.Y.: The Blessing of Abraham Come on the Gentiles
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Ballston Spa, New York Publisher: Comstock
Date of Publication: 1819
Library Location: Microfiche 080 Sh64a no. 49435 Nature of Source: This sermon was written with the intention of clarifying contested points of doctrine concerning baptism. Its author, Ethan Smith, also wrote The View of the Hebrews, which has often been compared by critics to the Book of Mormon. Smith at this time was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hebron and was on a mission in Warren County, New York. This sermon was published at the request of the Baptists.

Comment: The sermon takes as its text Galatians 3:14, "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." Smith describes the Abrahamic covenant, and the blessings now bestowed upon the Gentiles. He also argues in favor of infant baptism.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"What then, was the blessing of Abraham? Let the history of the fact, and the inspired illustrations of it, decide. In about 400 years after the flood, the world of mankind were found going off to gross idolatry. God then saw fit to adopt the following method to support his holy religion on earth. He selected one man, Abram, and called him to separate himself from his kindred, and to live as a pilgrim on earth. In his natural line Christ should come. And in the family of his natural descendants the true knowledge of God, and true religion, should be maintained. Here should be found the true church of God on earth. Here God would come, and would have a succession of true saints, walking in his ordinances; while all other nations were given up to idolatry. And from this family of Abram, true religion, after Christ should appear, should be propagated over the face of the world." (4)

"Having thus far illustrated the subject, I shall now attend more particularly to the question; - Are the infant seed of believers under the gospel to be dedicated to God in baptism? Is this involved in the blessing of Abraham, which has come on the Gentiles? This we affirm; while many deny. And it is not a point of minor importance. If this rich mercy be excluded from the blessing of Abraham, which has come on us, it should by all means be clearly ascertained. And the gentile church ought, in such a case, to be humble in the dust before the God of Abraham, that their seed are excluded from the ark of the gospel covenant, in which the natural seed of our father Abraham were expressly included. But if our children be not excluded, this should be clearly ascertained; and this precious branch of the blessing of Abraham should be most diligently improved for the salvation of the rising generation. Nature of Source: A funeral sermon given by Ezra Sampson, described on the title page as pastor of the Church in Plympton. Originally published in pamphlet form.

Comment: The discourse focuses on Isaiah xl: 6 and 7: "The voice said cry; and he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is of the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth." Sampson suggests that the death of this young girl should remind all mourners that "all flesh is grass" and death can strike at any moment. Directly contradicts the LDS doctrine that relationships will continue beyond the grave, with suggestions that "there is no continuing city" in the afterlife.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):
"Secondly, since life is so frail, and we have no continuing city here, let the thought be improved to wean us from the world. Why should we set our hearts upon that which is not? This is not our rest: it is not our home. There is no earthly comfort, which we may promise ourselves that we shall enjoy tomorrow. Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils. Set not your affections principally on things below: the time is short, the grass withereth, the flower of life fadeth. Let those then who have husbands, wives, children, brothers, and sisters, be as if they had none: for soon these endearing connections will be dissolved. And let those who weep, be as if they wept not, and those who rejoice, as if they rejoiced not: for the fashion of this world passeth away."

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Hartford

Date of Publication: 1797

Library Location: Microfiche Sh 64 EVANS 32820

Nature of Source: This collection of sermons was compiled by the Reverend Ephraim Judson at the request of the Litchfield North Association of Ministers. The Jonathon Edwards sermon focuses on judgment and the afterlife and takes 2 Timothy 1:10 as its text, "Our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." Edwards was pastor of the Church in Colebrook, Connecticut.

Comment: This sermon suggests that God's purpose in creation was the happiness of man, a happiness that will be perfect only in a future state. Edwards also suggests that man's reward or punishment will be endless and eternal in nature. Edwards emphasizes the importance of divine revelation to his argument, and generally contests the "Eat, drink and be merry for tomorrow we die" attitude he sees in many around him.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"One argument of this kind is, that without such a state, it does not appear that this world was made for any very valuable end. As the Deity is possessed of infinite perfection, infinite wisdom and goodness, doubtless all his works are designed to answer some most valuable and important end. But if there be not a future state, the creation of this world, and of the human race, does not appear to answer any such end." (112)

"I have now exhibited what appears to me the principal evidence, from the light of nature, of a future state of existence, and of the immortality of the soul. This evidence may be briefly summed up thus; - Men were made for some important end, either their own happiness or the divine glory. But neither of these ends appears to be, in this life, obtained, in a degree correspondent to the divine goodness, power and wisdom.-- Therefore, there is a future state, in which, one or other, or both these ends will be properly obtained. We have reason, from the goodness of God, to suppose that mankind will exist in a future state, and be happy; since goodness, especially infinite goodness, delights in the existence and happiness of intelligent beings. We may, therefore, believe that it will establish, both their existence and happiness, unless they be inconsistent with the greater happiness of some other being or beings... Lastly. Man is a rational creature, capable of virtue and vice, and actually practicing either the one or the other. He is, therefore, accountable to God; and God, as a friend to virtue and an enemy to vice, must properly reward the former and punish the latter. And, as this is not done in the present life, it must be done in a future state." (123)

"How important is time! It is the only opportunity we have to prepare for eternity. As our conduct is in time, so our eternal state will be. If we be wise and virtuous; if we walk in the narrow way of holiness, our eternity will be blessed. But if not; if we cast off fear and restrain prayer; if we love not God supremely and our neighbour sincerely; if we live without God and without Christ in the world; we must expect to be rejected by our final judge, saying 'Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels.'" Nature of Source: Given June 4, 1809 by Daniel Clark Sanders at the funeral of Mrs. Emily Jewett, this discourse asks the questions, "What is death?" and "What does preparation to die consist of?"

Comment: Subtitled "Preparation for Death A Reasonable Concern" this sermon focuses on Paul's declaration in 2 Timothy 4:6, "I am now ready to be offered." A detailed description is given of the physical nature of death, and it is suggested that one best prepares for death by showing charity to all men and developing characteristics that resemble Christ and God. The sermon argues against a reliance on "the religion of nature" or the philosophies of man, and suggests instead a turning of the mind to the Gospel of Christ. It is suggested that the guilty separate themselves from the goodness of God in this life and the hereafter, and that God will judge individuals based on their internal natures, not external actions.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages): Many points covered in this sermon bear striking resemblance to Mormon doctrine regarding the afterlife, including the eternal nature of familial relationships, and the idea that the same forces that govern individuals in this life will have power over them in the afterlife as well.

"The regions beyond the grave are no longer solitary. The greater part of our friends and endearred relations are already there. The thousand millions of men now on the earth leave it but a desert. Eternity only is truly populous. Call the grave no longer solitary. If multitudes were any thing, it were already full. Eternity can hardly be a word of horror, but conveying emotions of the tenderest kind, since more than one half of your friends are there, your venerable parents, your beloved child, your tender sister, your manly brother, the snow-white virgin, your kind neighbors and your intimate, once the half of your own soul." (6)

"In other words, a readiness to die consists in having a relish of heaven formed within the soul. God has boundless stores of glory sufficient for all his creatures. He is more ready to bestow them than we are to receive them aright. We can, therefore, judge of our fitness for the kingdom of God from our possessing a taste for what takes place there. If excluded from the abodes of the blessed, we shall exclude ourselves by our own capacity of relishing the enjoyments there. The kingdom of God is within every man, if intended any where to be his portion." (12)

Title of Book: Infidelity: Its Cause and Cure
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: London
Publisher: George Routledge and Sons
Date of Publication: 1854
Nature of Source: This book was written by a man who intended, at one point in his life, to prove the truthfulness of infidelity. His extensive studies, however, convinced him instead of the truthfulness of Christianity. Nelson then turned from his occupation as a physician to ministry, hoping to convince others to discover truth for themselves. A copy of this book (New York: J. S. Taylor, 1837) was held by the Manchester (New York) Library.

Comment: Nelson's primary intent in this book seems to be to urge people to read the Bible (and other books) to determine what is true, trusting that a sincere study of the Bible will help readers to be convinced of the truthfulness of Christianity.

Excerpt (pages):

"Infidelity is produced by two causes, acting conjointly. The primary, or more remote cause, is man's depravity; the second, or approximate cause, is man's want of knowledge. As it regards the first or original cause, man's wicked nature, we can readily see how it would bend his belief towards the side of falsehood. It must incline him to reject the sacred volume, which enjoins everything that is righteous, self-denying, pure, and holy. Again, we can easily understand how this first cause of unbelief, man's sinfulness, must tend towards the production of the second cause, his lack of information. It retards his labours [sic] in searching after truth; it aids in continuing his want of knowledge; it prevents his activity in search after facts which sustain the truth. As it regards the secondary, or proximate cause, want of knowledge, it sounds strange to speak of the ignorance of the learned. This seeming contradiction will be fully explained after a time." (1)

"Rejecters of the gospel are exceedingly credulous; and in support of a false system, receive that which is harder to believe than the truth." (52)

Title of Book: Lectures on Witchcraft: Comprising a History of the Delusion in Salem, in 1692
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Carter and Hendee
Date of Publication: 1832
Library Location: BYU Stacks BF 1576 .U66 Nature of Source: Charles Upham wrote extensively on the topic of the Salem witch trials. This book consists of a series of lectures that were originally delivered in the Salem Lyceum. The preface maintains that the book is published "In the hope that they may contribute, in combination with the great variety of other means now employed, to diffuse the blessings of knowledge, to check the prevalence of fanaticism, to accelerate the decay of superstition, to prevent an unrestrained exercise of imagination and passion in the individual or in societies of men." A copy of this book was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by John Gray.

Comment: This book defines a witch as one who has made a formal agreement with the Devil to do his will. This type of alliance implies the agency of the individual in choosing to side with Satan, for which the individual is then said to receive supernatural abilities. Interestingly, Upham describes a common belief that Satan marked the bodies of those who were in alliance with him (see page 40). This idea of a physical mark upon followers of Satan contrasts nicely with the Book of Mormon idea of a physical distinction placed upon those from whom the spirit of the Lord had withdrawn.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

Definition of a Witch:

"A witch was regarded by our fathers, as a person who had made an actual, deliberate and formal compact with Satan; by which compact, it was agreed that she should become his faithful subject, and do what she could in promoting his cause, and in consideration of this allegiance and service, he on his part agreed to exercise his supernatural powers in her favor, and communicate to her a portion of those powers.
Thus a witch was considered in the light of a person who had transferred allegiance and worship from God to the Devil." (18)

Physical mark on followers of Satan:

"It was believed that Satan affixed his mark to the bodies of those in alliance with him, and that the point where this mark was made became callous and dead." (40)

Division between powers of good and powers of evil:

"Early observers of nature in the East, were led to the conclusion that the world was a divided empire, and that it was ruled by the alternate or simultaneous energy of two great antagonist principles or beings, one perfectly good, and the other perfectly bad. It has been for a long time, as it probably is at this day, the prevailing faith among Christians that the Bible teaches a similar doctrine, and that it presents to our adoration and obedience a being of infinite perfections, in the Deity; and to our abhorrence and our fears, a being infinitely wicked, and of great power in the devil." (153)

The book concludes with this quote from the Hon. Joseph Story, associate Justice of the Supreme Court, concerning judgment:

"Let Witch-Hill remain forever memorable by this sad catastrophe, not to perpetuate our dishonor, but as an affecting, enduring proof of human infirmity, a proof, that perfect justice belongs to one judgment seat only - that which is linked to the throne of God." (280)

Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: Fowler and Wells
Date of Publication: 1880
Library Location: BYU Stacks BF 870 C6 1880
Nature of Source: A copy of this book was held by the Manchester (New York) Library. This book is an extensive discourse on phrenology. It includes interesting chapters on conditions required for maintaining happiness, natural laws, punishment, and the relationship between science and scripture. The Manchester Library held the 1836 (New York: Collins, Keese and Co.) edition.

Comment: One chapter of this book explores the topic of science and scripture, suggesting that God's power is in harmony with laws of organization. It also repeatedly implies that much of scripture has been misinterpreted and mistranslated, and suggests that observable, scientific evidence should be relied upon to illuminate and eliminate these errors.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):
"My inference, therefore, is, that the Divine Spirit, revealed in Scripture as a power influencing the human mind, invariably acts in harmony with the laws of organization, because the latter, as emanating from the same source, can never be in contradiction with the former; and because a well-constituted brain is a condition essential to the existence of Christian dispositions. If this be really the fact, and if the constitution of the brain be in any degree regulated by the laws of physiology, it is impossible to doubt that a knowledge of the natural laws is destined to exercise a vast influence in rendering men capable of appreciating and practising [sic] Christianity." (353)

"Nothing can afford a more convincing proof of the necessity of using all the lights in our power, by which to ascertain the true meaning of Scripture and the soundness of our interpretations of it, than the wide diversity of the opinions which even the most learned and pious divines have based upon the Bible. Another fact of some importance in relation to this matter is, that the manuscripts which handed down the sacred writings to us from ancient times vary in many important passages, sometimes through the ignorance and carelessness of transcribers, and sometimes in consequence of wilful corruption and interpolations by contending sects." (361)

"The folly of setting up any isolated passage of Scripture against truths brought to light by experiment and observation, is rendered still more obvious by what Bishop Taylor says respecting the extreme difficulty of discovering the real meaning of many parts of the Bible, even where there are sufficient grounds for believing the text to be genuine..." (363)

Length of Relevant Material: 436 pages
Nature of Source: This collection of sermons was compiled by the Reverend Ephraim Judson at the request of the Litchfield North Association of Ministers. This sermon by Peter Starr, pastor of the Church in Warren, Connecticut, takes Jeremiah 1:5 as its text, "Come and let us join ourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten."

Comment: Starr contends that all men fell under condemnation because of the fall, and that men must join in a covenant with Christ in order to receive of His grace. The sermon attempts to encourage listeners to "join in this covenant" by uniting themselves visibly to the church.

Excerpt (pages):

"Covenanting with God has long been in use, in the Jewish church. Never was a time more proper for this, than when they were about to set up their temple worship, and attend upon the instituted rites of their religion. It was now their devout and ardent wish, to bind themselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant. God hath still a church in the world which will be continued to the end of time. He is unchangeably the same, yesterday, to day, and forever. Mankind are the same they always were. They stand in the same relation to God, as their Creator, Preserver and Redeemer. - Hence they are under special obligations to come and join themselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." (366)

"We may be sure, therefore, that he who is joined unto the Lord, is a person of a very different character, from what he once was, and from what all are still, whose hearts are unreconciled to God. He really loves a crucified Saviour, and the humbling terms of the gospel." (370)

"It is worthy of notice, that the covenant relation between Christ and believers shall never be dissolved. - It is called in the text a perpetual covenant which shall not be forgotten. Hence it is called an everlasting covenant. (374)

"In the last place: having thus prepared your mind, and the subject, for the contemplation of natural providence, do not content yourself to consider only the present face of nature, but look back into the first sources of things, into their more simple and original states, and observe the progress of nature from one form to another, through various modes and compositions. For there is no single effect, nor any single state of nature, how perfect soever, that can be such an argument and demonstration of providence, as a period of nature, or a revolution of several states consequential to one another; and in such an order and dependance, that as they flow and succeed, they shall still be adjusted to the periods of the moral world; so as to be ready always to be ministers of the Divine justice or beneficence to mankind. This shews the manifold riches of the wisdom and power of God in nature." (360)
"We have clearly discovered many final causes and characters of wisdom and contrivance in the frame of the inanimate world, as well as in the organical fabric of the bodies of animals. - Now from hence ariseth a new and invincible argument, that the present frame of the world hath not existed from all eternity. For such an usefulness of things, or a fitness of means to ends, as neither proceeds from the necessity of their intelligent Being, which was the author and contriver of that usefulness." (716)

The sermon discusses the destructions of Tyre, Sodom and Gomorrah, Babylon, Ninevah, and Jerusalem in terms of the pride of the world. The sermon emphasizes God's omnipotence, but also touches on the Book of Mormon idea that God uses the wicked to destroy the wicked.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"Whoever acknowledges these truths, must grant, that God may make use of men as instruments of bringing about his purposes, when, at the same time, they may be exceedingly wicked in his sight. The instance now brought up for illustration contains all the real difficulty, which could be stated in any other case. God may make use of instruments which are accountable, to execute his purposes on earth, as well as those which are not accountable. It is a fact, that he now does, and ever has. He raises up an army from the brutal creation, such as insects and reptiles, to scourge one nation, and he sendeth waiting pestilence to punish another. Some cities and populous places are destroyed by earthquakes, and others by the sword. Human blood is caused to run in the streets of some cities, by the sword of foreign enemies, and in the streets of others it flows with equal abundance, by the deadly weapons, which they carry in their own bosom." (275)

"If we believe there is a God, and that his providence is universal, let us adopt language, which will be consistent with such a belief. Our conversation at all times, and in all places, should correspond with the truths we embrace. This is one way for us to manifest light and truth to others." (285)

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Hartford

Publisher: Hudson & Goodwin

Date of Publication: 1797

Library Location: Microfiche 080 Sh64 EVANS 32820

Nature of Source: This collection of sermons was compiled by the Reverend Ephraim Judson at the request of the Litchfield North Association of Ministers. The John Stevens sermon, entitled "The Church of Christ essentially the same, in all Ages" takes Ephesians 1: 22-23 as its text, "And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Stevens was pastor of a church in New Marlborough, Massachusetts.

Comment: This sermon puts forth the argument that there has only ever been one Church of Christ, and that the modern Christian church is "a continuance and extension of the Jewish church" (62). Stevens looks at parallels between Abraham and Peter, and further suggests that the ordinance of baptism in the second dispensation is similar to that of circumcision in the first. Stevens argues for the practice of infant baptism, and concludes that, in both dispensations, Christ has been the head of his church.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

Jewish and Christian church the same: "Again; when I say, that the church of Christ is continued, from the old to the new dispensation, I mean to be understood that the Jewish church and the christian, [sic] as to essentials, are the same. The believing Jews, who held fast their integrity in God, and belief in the Messiah to come, continued to be his church, until and after the coming of Christ. And the Gentiles, who embraced christianity, [sic] were grafted into the Jewish church, as an old stock; and so Jews and Gentiles became one body, called the Christian church. This church has continued ever since its first formation, and will continue, essentially the same, until time shall be no more. All the difference which can be found, between God's church of old, and the Christian church, consists in external modes and forms, arising wholly from the different dispensations." (63-4)

The idea of covenant: "It is said by some, that it is not consistent for God to enter into covenant with men; and the reason urged is, that it would degrade the divine character, and exalt the creature too high - it would put man upon a par with God. But this arises, entirely, from a wrong apprehension of the covenant of grace. According to the above definition of this covenant, and God's establishing it with men, there is not the least appearance of degrading the divine character, or raising man to a par with God. Covenant transactions, by no means, necessarily imply equality in the parties covenenting. All that is necessarily implied is, the consent and engagement of the parties." (65-6)

Summary of points of argument: "The sum of the arguments, in proof of this doctrine, is that the church of God ever was, and is built upon the plan of the covenant of grace, having Christ for the unchangeable foundation - The qualification for visible membership, under the old and new dispensations, is the same - The Scriptures declare the moral character of the Jewish and Christian churches to be the same - The familiarity of the sacraments, under both dispensations - The natural body, a similitude, to which the church is compared - Under both dispensations, the church is said to be purchased and redeemed by Christ - The great designs of Christ, in all that he has done, in his mediatorial office; and finally; plain, express scripture testimony, both respecting the line, in which the church descended from Abraham, and the particular engrafting of the Gentiles into the old stock, in the days of the Apostles." (81-2)

Infant Baptism: "It being so demonstrably clear, from the holy scriptures, that the church of Christ is essentially the same in all ages, in the fullest manner establishes the doctrine of infant baptism. "(103)

"And thus we see, that, as the church of Christ is the same, essentially, under every dispensation, it is not only a privilege, but an incumbent duty on all believing parents, who visibly belong to the body of Christ, to dedicate their children, in baptism, to him. Therefore, my Christian brethren, it will exculpate us no more to say, that we cannot see the scripture evidence to support this duty, than it did those spoken of in the gospel." (106)

Comment: Written in a journal-like or anecdotal style, this book contains little (if any) Englishman's view of Egypt and Israel in the late 1830s. Mentions visits to several temples and tombs, along with descriptions of Bethlehem, Jerusalem, the Dead Sea etc.

Excerpt (pages):

Egypt: "I was curious to see the form of modern burial in Egypt, but I hesitated in following. Some of the Arabs had looked rudely at me in passing, and I did not know whether the bigoted Musulmans [sic] would tolerate the intrusion of a stranger and a Christian. I followed on, however, looking out for Paul, and fortunately met him at the gate of the burying-ground. The sheik was standing outside, ordering and arranging; and I went up to him with Paul, and asked if there was any objection to my entering; he not only permitted it, but, telling me to follow him, with a good deal of noise and an unceremonious use of the scabbard of his sword, he cleared a way through the crowd, and even roughly breaking through the ranks of women, so as materially to disturb their business of mourning, and putting back friends and relations, gave me a place at the head of the tomb. It was square, with a round top, built of Nile mud, and whitewashed; two men were engaged in opening it, which was done simply by pulling away a few stones and scooping out the sand with their hands... A few stones remained to be rolled away, and the door, or rather the hole, was opened; the two men crawled in, remained a minute or two, came out, and went for the corpse." (71-2)

At Mount Sinai: "The rock was covered with inscriptions; but I could not read them. I walked round and round it with Paul at my elbows, looking eagerly for some small scrap, a single line, in a language we could read; but all were strange, and at length we gave up the search. In several places in the wilderness of Sinai the rocks are filled with inscriptions, supposed to have been made by the Jews; and finding those before me utterly beyond my comprehension, I resolved to carry them back to a respectable antiquity, and in many of the worn and faded characters to recognise [sic] the work of some wandering Israelite. I meditated, also, a desperate but noble deed. Those who had written before me were long since dead; but in this lonely desert they had left a record of themselves and of their language. I resolved to add one of my country's also." (201)

"You will find it to be suggested by several able men, that the word 'day' in the brief account of the Creation, in Genesis, was not meant to be restricted to our duration of twenty-four hours; but was rather used as a term to express an indefinite period of time: and that Six days of creation express only so many successive stages; and that each of these may be construed to be a thousand years... yet, after the most patient comparison and consideration of their facts and reasonings, I cannot but feel that they have not at all advanced beyond plausible conjectures, as I also perceive that they are mostly at variance with each other; and that, as fast as one theory of this sort is set up, it has been found to be wrong by a succeeding inquirer, who attempts, in his turn, to establish a different one, of the same tendency, in its stead." (29;31; vol. 1)

"I will not enter into a metaphysical description of the nature of the human soul in this Letter. We all see and feel its difference from the Animal mind, and its great, unapproachable, and ever-increasing superiority. Its progressive, and as yet unlimited, improveability, is quite sufficient to distinguish it, permanently and specifically, from all other classes of life or mind that are known upon our Earth. Its origin was the Divine breath. It is therefore an emanation from the Divine Spirit, and in this sacred source of its existence, its similitude to its Creator began. Its intellectual and moral powers and qualities may be assumed to have a proportioned resemblance in essential nature, tho but in remote miniature, and infinitely inferior. We feel and think in some respect and degree like our Great Author, however diminutive the proportion may be - We are addressed by Him, throughout all His revelations, as if we did so - He has therefore made our intelligent Spirit in such a likeness to His own, that there can be intercourse and communion, and sympathy, affection, and affinity between Man and God. His sacred mind can at all times, from this similarity, make itself intelligible to us and perceptible by us. He can at all times impress our sensibilities, and communicate His influences. We are essentially His Image and likeness in our original nature and capacities; and the more steadily and successfully we advance to all the attainable perfections of our being, the more complete the actual assimilation will become." (536-7; vol. 1)

"Another World will open a new scene of His Creations, and in them afford us new displays of His intellect, and new materials of sensation, perception, thought, and feeling. But in the present, we can only obtain what is before us and about us. Of this, we may take and acquire as much or as little knowlege [sic] as we please. The more we imbibe, the more we shall be in this respect His Image and His likeness." (541; vol. 1)

"We have no personal knowlege [sic] that there are any Beings in existence besides ourselves: but there is no reason for our denying or disbelieving that there are any." (546; vol. 1)

Title of Book: The Art of Being Happy

Title of Article: The Philosophy of Happiness

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Carter and Hendee

Date of Publication: 1832

Library Location: BYU Stacks BJ 1482.D7 1832

Nature of Source: This book was originally written by Droz as a series of letters to his children on the topic of happiness. In this edition, Timothy Flint has translated The Art of Happiness from French to English, adding editorial comments at the end of the book and choosing to omit certain passages that he felt might have led readers to suspect the author of Epicurean tendencies. A copy of this book was held by the Manchester (New York) Library.

Comment: The chapter of this book entitled "Religious Sentiments" includes many ideas that have implications for LDS readers. The author claims that religious hopes for immortality lead to happiness, and that choosing good over evil is the way to feel at peace in this life. Notably missing from these pages, however, is what seems to be a link between these two ideas: the Book of Mormon idea that "Men are that they might have joy." (2 Nephi 2:25) The author also argues against fatalist tendencies and states his opposition to the view of God as a vengeful executor of justice.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"The philosophy of happiness must find its ultimate requisite in the hopes of religion. Man must be persuaded that his present life has relation to a never ending future, and that an eternal providence watches over the universe, before he will abandon himself with a tranquil confidence to those irresistible laws by which he is borne along. He then marches towards the future, as he would confidently follow a guide of tried prudence and fidelity in a dark path." (154)

"In another life, the measure of our felicity in the mansions of the just, will be the happiness we have created for the beings around us in this fleeting existence. A religious man constantly strives to render this, our terrestrial sojourn, more like the abode towards which his thoughts are elevated. His constant occupation is to mitigate suffering, banish prejudice and hatred, and calm the fury of party. All his relations are those of peace and love. Intolerant men! Who, of your number, will hope to hear it said of him in the retribution of the just, 'much has been forgiven him, because he has loved much?' " (163)

"To Protestant Christians the events of Texas are further deeply interesting, as an indication of Providence in relation to the propagation of divine truth in other parts of the Mexican dominions. They do not expect, nor even wish to plant among the millions of nominal Romanists in that country the true gospel by either the sword or legislative enactment; but they do desire and expect to see the time not long hence, when constitutional and legal obstructions to the gospel will even in Mexico be removed."
(xviii)

"It is a pleasure to observe, that christians [sic] in the United States are not forgetful of these dwellers in the wilderness, but send to them, by the hands of faithful men, the precious words of eternal life. Though no deep toned bell called together the solemn assembly, yet even here the solemnity of the sabbath could awe the heart, and call from their rustic dwellings these tenants of the wild, and bid them remember the Lord."
(39)

"While we trace the westward march of the star of empire, may we not expect that with equal speed the beams of the star of Bethlehem will delightfully illuminate the path of the heralds of worldly power? and that wherever the temples of political power ascend, there too will be found the gospel to consecrate the dome and regulate the influence of authority?"
(66)

"What inducements are here given to the skilful [sic] cultivator of the soil; what prospects of wealth to the industrious mechanic, and what a wide and endless field for speculation to the man of foresight and business! If he would carve out his own fortune at the expense of temporary sacrifices, in preference to fretting away his existence in the slavish occupancy of an overstrained competition, let him turn his eyes and footsteps to the illimitable west." (112)

"It has already been shown that wild horses, or as they are called by the Mexicans, mustangs, exist in considerable numbers among the prairies. They are descendants from European sires, but have become fully established as tenants of the prairies." (184)

"The question is asked with earnestness, cannot they be reclaimed, and would not the labors of missionaries among them be productive of great good? Though it is admitted that the influence of the gospel is mighty even to the pulling down of the strong holds of iniquity, it is believed that till the savage has ceased to be a mere stroller over the face of the desert, the labors of the missionary is likely to be of very little avail.
When once the native commences his field, erects his house, and begins to aim at some degree of improvement, there is hope for the success of the missionary, and the advancement of the savage in all that pertains to moral and intellectual culture. Till this is begun, strong doubt exists whether the savage ear will be open to the law that forbids to steal and requires love to all men. It is no doubt exceedingly desirable to the heart of christian [sic] philanthropy to reclaim these wanderers of the prairie from their wild and savage courses; and full freely no doubt would many a zealous minister cast his lot among them for their good were the way open, but at present no pleasing prospect of rendering them spiritual aid appears. (255)

Comment: This book is an early study in the science of logic. While it insists on logic as a scientific principle and does not refer in any way to the divine, its analysis of progression and knowledge does have relevance to LDS doctrine, particularly the idea that knowledge is added to 'line upon line.' Provides a good contrast to LDS thought.

"It is in the various Comparisons of these Ideas, according to such Combinations of them as seem best to suit its Ends, that the Understanding exerts itself in the Acts of Judging and Reasoning, by which the capacious Mind of Man pushes on its Views of Things, adds Discovery to Discovery, and often extends its Thoughts beyond the utmost Bounds of the Universe. Thus we see as it were at one Glance, the whole Progress of the Soul, from the very first Dawnings of Perception, till it reaches the Perfection of human Knowledge;" (19)

"This Idea of the Infinity of Number, imperfect as it may seem, is nevertheless that, by which the Mind ascends to the Conception of Eternity and Immensity. For when we consider Duration, either as past, or to come, we find nothing to stop the Progress of our Thoughts, in the Repetition of Years, or Millions of Years: the farther we proceed, the more the Idea grows upon us, and when we have wearied ourselves with vain Efforts, we must own at last, that we can no more arrive at the End of Duration, than at the End of Number. It is true, the several Generations of Men, rise and disappear in very quick Successions; Earth itself may decay, and those bright Luminaries that adorn the Firmament of Heaven, be extinguished. But the Course of Time, will not thereby disturbed; that flows uniform and invariable, nor is bounded by the Period of their Existence." (58-9)

"In this Way of putting together our Thoughts, it is evident at first sight, that however far we carry our Researches, Science and Certainty will still attend us. But what is particularly elegant and happy in the Method now explained: we hereby see Knowledge rising out of its first Elements, and discern distinctly how those Elements are combined and interwoven, in order to the erecting of a goodly Structure of Truth." Title of Book: The Glory of Christ as God - Man: Displayed in Three Discourses
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Manning and Loring
Date of Publication: 1795
Library Location: Microfiche 080 Sh64 EVANS 29844 Three microfiche.
Nature of Source: The three separate discourses included in this book are titled:
  1. A survey of the visible appearances of Christ, as God, before his Incarnation; with some Observations on the Texts of the Old Testament applied to CHRIST.
  2. An Inquiry into the extensive Powers of the Human Nature of Christ in its present glorified State, with several Testimonies annexed.
  3. An Argument tracing out the early Existence of the Human Soul of Christ, even before the Creation of the World.
Also included is an appendix which contains, "An Abridgment of Dr. Thomas Goodwin's Discourse of the Glories and Royalties of CHRIST."

Comment: This text focuses heavily on Old and New Testament scripture, explicated by Watts. The author acknowledges in the preface that the nature of the Trinity is uncertain and unknown to human understanding, and does not attempt to explain its properties. The focus is entirely on Christ and his distinct nature as both God and Man.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"The glories of Christ, both in his divine and human nature, which are here unfolded, are not necessarily confined to any particular schemes or hypothesis of the Trinity. All that I pretend to maintain here is, that our blessed Saviour must be God and he must be Man; God and Man in two distinct natures, and one person, i.e. one complex personal agent." (v)

"It has been a common practice with us, because we know that Jesus Christ is true God, and that his human nature is united to the divine; therefore, whencesoever we read any glorious and sublime attributions to our blessed Redeemer in scripture, we content ourselves immediately to refer them all to his divine nature, as being all-sufficient to support them; not considering that we may perhaps by this means swallow up and bury some of the most illustrious excellencies and honours of the Man Christ Jesus, nor suffer his human nature to receive that due share of glory and dignity to which the Father has advanced it." Title of Article:

Title of Periodical:

Place of Publication: Boston

Publisher: Bowles and Dearborn

Date of Publication: 1828

Library Location: BYU Stacks BT 210 .U6

Nature of Source: A collection of letters written by Charles Upham, Associate Minister of the First Church in Salem, to Henry Ware, Hollis Professor of Divinity at Harvard University. Upham acknowledges that much of his argument was suggested by his reading of Lowman's Three Tracts. This book was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by John Gray.

Comment: These letters are concerned with the characteristics and nature of Jesus Christ. Many questions of contemporary importance are raised: What is Christ's precise relationship with the Father? What are Christ's divine attributes, and which of his characteristics are associated with humanity? Was Christ involved in the creation? Upham's argument relies extensively on scriptures from both the Old and New Testament, and involves ideas regarding the nature of language itself, particularly in its relationship to images.

Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):

"It must appear to an observing mind, that for some time past, the Trinitarian and Unitarian forces have been gradually retiring from every other position, and concentrating upon this very ground. The question which at the present day engages attention, is this; What was the meaning of John when he said, 'The Word was in the beginning;’ 'It was with God;’ 'It was God;’ 'It created all things; and It became flesh?’ A satisfactory answer to this question would impart relief and joy to innumerable minds. It is in waiting for this answer, that christian [sic] truth delays her progress of triumph..."

(vii)

"Christ I think to have been 'The Word of God,' because he was the instrument or agent, which conveyed the will and purposes of God to man. He was 'The Word of God' in as much as he was the image of the moral attributes and principles of God. And his gospel was 'The Word of God,' in the same manner in which we speak of words, understanding, thereby, the meaning and sense which they convey... and finally, in a few words, I pointed out the glorious dignity and exaltation which it ascribes to Jesus Christ, as the chosen organ of communication between the Creator and the creature, as the mediator, through whom all the truths, and precepts, and promises of religions have come down to us, and as the continual intercessor, through whom all prayer and spiritual service, if it would be acceptable, must go up to the Father."

"You will have remarked that the leading peculiarity of my theory is, that Logos was originally derived from the name applied by the Jews to the Divine appearances, and that its true meaning is to be found by investigating the views which they entertained of these Divine appearances. The correspondency between 'Logos' and "Mimra," the title of those appearances, has frequently been observed, and it is to me a cause of surprise that scholars have not thought it important to detect the several meanings of "Mimra," with the view of discovering the source, and the original meaning of Logos."

The author's preface explains that many of the entries draw on explanations from previous compilations, often with corrections and clarifications. A copy of this book was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by Josiah Ellis.

Comment: The entry for "Temple" defines a temple as the house of God; properly the temple of Solomon. Solomon's temple, the temple erected by Zerubbabel and Joshua, and Herod's rebuilding of this temple are discussed both historically and in terms of their structural appearances.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages): "The temple erected by Solomon was more splendid and magnificent than the second temple, which was deficient in five remarkable things that constituted the chief glory of the first; these were, the ark and the mercy seat; the shechinah, or manifestation of the divine presence, in the holy of holies; the sacred fire on the altar, which had been first kindled from heaven; the urim and thummim; and the spirit of prophecy. describes the possibility of an audible voice from the mercy seat, heard by the high priest when clothed in the breastplate.

Nature of Source: This is a collection of three discourses:

1. The Glories of the heavenly World displayed and improved. From, Psal. 73. 24.
2. A Religious Conversation excited and assisted. From, Mal. 3. 16.
3. The great Duty of Self-Examination urged on the Professors of Religion; and Signs of Grace laid down, whereby to Prove themselves. From 2 Cor. 13. 5.

These sermons were written by Israel Loring, pastor of a church in Sudbury, Boston. This entry focuses on the second and third discourses.

Comment: Discourse number two is interested in motivating people to speak about religious subjects in their day-to-day lives, and invites them to encourage and uplift one another through their speech. It also condemns idle talk or slander. Discourse number three encourages people to consider often their own spiritual state, particularly before the Sacrament, and includes an interesting discussion on the concept of grace.

"And when the great and last Day of Judgment comes, (of which the Destruction of Jerusalem has been look'd upon as a Type) The Day that shall burn as an Oven, when all the Proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be Stubble: when the Day comes, that shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts; and it shall leave them neither Root nor Branch. I say, when this Day comes (and it may come sooner than a great many think for) will not our glorious LORD send his holy Angels to find out such as fear the Lord, and speak often to one another, by whom they will be caught up to meet the Lord in the Air?” (98-9)

"Consider, it is a most dangerous thing to be mistaken. If godly Ones be mistaken in judging their State to be worse than it is; the Consequents of this Mistake would be sad; but if the Ungodly be mistaken, the Danger, the Mischief, the Misery which follow, are unspeakably great. This will confirm them in the Service of Satan, and fix in their present way of Death and Destruction; thinking they are whole, they will not seek after the Physician. The Opinion that they have CHRIST already, will keep them out of Him." (125)

"It will make a Child of GOD strong, lively & vigorous in the Work of the LORD, since he knows that his Labour shall not be in vain in the LORD, that when he rests from his Labours his Works will follow Him. And how sweet is the Word of GOD to such an one, and the precious Promises scattered up and down therein, when he is assured they are his own! Sweeter than Honey, or dropping Honey-Comb. And with what holy Boldness and Comfort may such an one go to God by Prayer, when he can look up to GOD and say in full Assurance, my Father; and know that he is heartily welcome to the Throne of Grace thro' CHRIST, and has a Promise of gracious Audience." Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Samuel T. Armstrong
Date of Publication: 1814 (2nd edition)
Library Location: BYU Stacks BS 830 .S65x 1814
Nature of Source: Subtitled, "Exhibiting the rise, character, and overthrow of that terrible power: and a treatise on the seven apocalyptic vials," this book focuses on the last days, the prophecies of Revelations, and Christ's kingdom in the Millennium. Discusses the Roman popery as an agent of Antichrist, though not Antichrist in its entirety. Also includes an analysis of the French Revolution, suggesting that it spread a spirit of atheism, and discusses the current spiritual state of the United States. The book is a call to repentance. Notably, this book was written by the author of View of the Hebrews, to which the Book of Mormon has commonly been compared.

Comment: Smith notes the following specific blessings of the Millennium, beginning on page 539: God will then be glorified on earth; Jesus Christ will then be honored; A day of salvation; The influence of Satan among men will be utterly restrained; Pure religion will then every where prevail; Sabbaths will be sanctified; It will be a season of civil peace; A season of great health, longevity, and outward prosperity; Civil governments will then be perfectly subordinate to the interests of Zion; A time of great knowledge; A season of eminent holiness; of intense benevolence; A season of great religious and spiritual enjoyment; The systems of cavilling [sic], error, schism and heresy, which now infest and disfigure the Church, will then be no more; That millennial Kingdom will be a time when the characters and conduct of men, in the times preceding that kingdom will be duly estimated; and the wicked will be held in their merited abhorrence.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

"The American revolutionary war was on our part just and necessary. And the revolution, which gave the Americans a national existence, was among the great events of Providence, which were to prepare the way for the millennial glory of the Church." (206)

On religious revivals: "In the view of the preceding remarks, and of the dangerous process of fanaticism and false religion, we must believe that many false teachers are among the agents of Antichrist, and are the most successful promoters of Infidelity. Open propagators of Atheism would not be so successful. People would be more likely to be alarmed, and would shun them. But let the same principles be really taught in gradual process; and let it be done under the notion of religion, and a pious zeal, and it is far more fatal." (212)

"Upon the same principle it is, that the Millennium is abundantly predicted as the coming of the Kingdom of Christ. Not because it will be a new Kingdom; but a new advancement (and to a far greater degree than ever) of the Kingdom of grace and salvation." (527)

"It might reasonably be expected, that God would make his gospel eventually to become prevalent through the world; that it should finally produce its proper effect, in governing the hearts and lives of mankind on earth. It would be unaccountable, if this should not be the case... God will make the world to know what his Gospel and religion can do, for the happiness of man, temporal, as well as eternal." (529)

Nature of Source: A two volume set of Moral Tales was held by the Manchester (New York) Library. There has been much speculation as to whether or not members of the Smith family were patrons of this library, and if Joseph Smith may have been influenced by the books there. Moral Tales is a collection of short stories written particularly for youth, which was originally published in 1802. The Manchester Library held an 1819 (New York, W. B. Gilley) edition of this work.
Comment: While the substance of these stories has little to do with the Restoration, Moral Tales would be interesting to compare in narrative structure and technique to the Book of Mormon if it could be shown with any degree of certainty that Joseph Smith may have read them as a youth.

"It has been said somewhere by Johnson, that merely to invent a story is no small effort of the human understanding. How much more difficult is it to construct stories suited to the early years of youth, and, at the same time, conformable to the complicate relations of modern society - fictions, that shall display examples of virtue, without initiating the young reader into the way of vice - narratives, written in a style level to his capacity, without tedious detail, or vulgar idiom!" Publisher: Gould and Lincoln
Library Location: BYU Stacks BJ 1251 .W3
(Note: The Manchester Library held the 1843 revised edition of this book, published in Boston by Gould, Kendall and Lincoln.)
Nature of Source: This book began as a series of lectures given by the author, a professor of moral philosophy and president of Brown University. It was originally published in 1835, but later revised and republished with hints on how to use the book in a classroom. The Manchester (New York) Library held a copy of the 1843 revised edition of this book.
Comment: The Elements of Moral Science centers around the idea that man was created by God, and endowed with intellectual powers of reason and conscience, though still completely dependent on the Creator. Similarities to LDS doctrine seen in this book include ideas relating to accountability, to the ability to judge between right and wrong, and to one's happiness being dependent upon one's actions as they are in accordance with God's laws.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):

Accountability:

"6. And hence we see that two things are necessary, in order to constitute any being a moral agent. They are, first, that he possess an intellectual power by which he can understand the relation in which he stands to the beings by whom he is surrounded; secondly, that he possess a moral power, by which the feeling of obligation is suggested to him as soon as the relation in which he stands is understood. This is sufficient to render him a moral agent. He is accountable, just in proportion to the opportunity which he has enjoyed, for acquiring a knowledge of the relations in which he stands, and of the manner in which his obligations are to be discharged." (48)

Discerning right from wrong:

"It seems then, from what has been remarked, that we are all endowed with conscience, or a faculty for discerning a moral quality in human actions, impelling us towards right, and dissuading us from wrong; and that the dictates of this faculty are felt and known to be of supreme authority. The possession of this faculty renders us accountable creatures. Without it, we should not be specially distinguished from the brutes. With it, we are brought into moral relations with God, and all the moral intelligences in the universe. It is an ever-present faculty. It always admonishes us, if we will listen to its voice, and frequently does so, even when we wish to silence its warnings. Hence, we may always know our duty, if we will but inquire for it." (83)

Happiness in obeying God's laws:

"Hence, while it is the truth, that human happiness consists in the gratification of our desires, it is not the whole truth. It consists in the gratification of our desires within the limits assigned to them by our Creator. And, the happiness of that man will be the most perfect, who regulates his desires most perfectly in accordance with the laws under which he has been created. And, hence, the greatest happiness of which man is, in his present state, capable, is to be attained by conforming his whole conduct to the laws of virtue, that is, to the will of God." (103)

Publisher: Oliver D. Cooke & Sons
Date of Publication: 1824
Library Location: BYU Special Collections. Americana collection. BL 80 .R6 1824
Nature of Source: This book is divided into four primary sections, focusing on Christianity, Judaism, Mahometanism, and Paganism. Also includes a lengthy essay by Ward on the "Idolatry of the Hindoos [sic]." A copy of this book was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by Joseph Bates.
Comment: This book begins with an introduction that defines religion for the reader and sets up the premises that the rest of the book is based upon. In its survey of what the author views to be the major religions of the world, this book emphasizes the importance of revelation, and of Christianity as "the true religion of God." Looks specifically at different branches of Catholicism and Protestantism.

Place of Publication: Boston

Date of Publication: 1839
Library Location: BYU Stacks BX 9941 .S56x 1839 Nature of Source: Universalism Illustrated and Defended began as a series of lectures delivered by Otis Skinner, pastor of the Fifth Universality Society in Boston. It is subtitled, "Being a System of Doctrinal and Practical Divinity, deduced from Reason and Revelation." This book was donated to the Nauvoo Library and Literary Institute by Miles and Balls.

Comment: This book discusses the authority of the Bible as a complete and divine text, suggests that there is but one God, and refutes the idea of the Trinity by suggesting that God would not give a religion to his people in which the central tenant was an unexplainable mystery. Additionally, it describes beliefs that are unique to Universalism, including views on the nature of the atonement, the character of Christ, and doctrines pertaining to election and salvation. This would be a good source for anyone wishing to compare contemporary Universalist ideas with doctrines of the emerging LDS Church.

Excerpt (pages):

On miracles as evidence of revelation: (Inserted quotation identified in footnote as coming from Rev. O. Dewey's Dudleian Lecture delivered before Harvard University, May 14th, 1836.)

"I have dwelt longer upon the miracles, and their inseparable connection with the evidences of Christianity [sic] than I should have done, had not much been written of late, to show that miracles are not legitimate proof of the divine authority of the person who performs them; and that if they were, we have not sufficient evidence that the miracles recorded in the four gospels took place, to make them the ground of faith. The first of these propositions is in direct opposition to the Scriptures; for they declare that Christ was approved of God by signs and wonders; and that we ought to believe the Father sent him, because he performed miraculous works. In what other way could Jesus have demonstrated the divinity of his mission? 'Suppose a man to stand before you and to say, 'I am the bearer of a special communication from God.' What would you - what must you ask of him, as the credentials of his mission? His air might be noble, his doctrine excellent, his speech divine. His communication might thrill you with awe, or with rapture. Would that satisfy you? If you were an enthusiast, if might; but if you were a philosopher, I am sure it would not... What could make you believe it? I can conceive of but one thing, - a miracle. If he came from an earthly monarch, you would demand his credentials, - the signet ring, or the sign manual. The chosen seal of the Almighty Monarch is miracle!" (14)

Directly contradicts the idea of plurality of Gods:

"The self-existence of God proves his unity. God must exist necessarily, or by the will of another. If by the will of another, his existence is derived, he is dependent, not all-wise and all-controlling, and, therefore, not God. Hence the Author of all existence, the great Cause of all causes, must exist necessarily, and have every perfection; and if so, it is impossible that there should be two Gods. For instance, there cannot be two infinite powers; for infinite power must be above all, and control all. But if there be two infinite powers, one can neither be above nor controlled by the other. Hence there is but one God." (51)

Arguing against the idea of a vicarious atonement:

"The system of vicarious atonement abounds with contradictions and absurdities. For instance, it represents the sinner as owing God an infinite debt, which he insists upon being paid; but the sinner is finite, and has no means of answering the demand. What shall be done? Shall the sinner be sacrificed? God cannot discharge the debt, for his law and authority have been dishonored, and he must vindicate his claims as a righteous Governor. What plan does he adopt? According to this system, he pays the demand himself!! Yes, God appeases his own wrath; and pours upon himself his own vengeance! A strange method this to vindicate his honor! How idle, how unnecessary does this make the atonement. (116)

On election:

"Nothing is more distinctly taught in the Bible than that some are elected to certain peculiar privileges. The words elect, elected, election, chose, and chosen, are of very frequent occurrence... The question, therefore, to be discussed in this chapter, is, what is the scripture doctrine of election? There can be no fairer way of answering this, than by referring to the cases of election mentioned in the Bible. On considering these, let us keep in mind the fact, that the elect are chosen, not for their own good exclusively, but also for the good of the non-elect; that they are instruments in the divine hand, to aid in accomplishing the designs of grace and love." Title of Book: An Account of the Manuscripts of Gen. Dearborn, as Massachusetts Commissioner in 1838 and 1839 for the sale of the Seneca Indian lands in the State of New York
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Albany
Publisher: Weed, Parsons and Company, Printers
Date of Publication: 1881
Library Location: Microfiche E 203 P36x I No. 935
Nature of Source: An address given by Henry A. Homes, librarian of the State Library, to the Albany Institute on October 12th, 1880. Later published in book form, along with the manuscripts of General Dearborn, who supervised the purchase of the Seneca Indian lands for the state of Massachusetts. (The microfiche held by the BYU library does not include these manuscripts.) Homes' address describes the process by which he acquired the manuscripts, and provides a short history of the interactions of the Seneca Indians and the United States government.
Comment: This source is perhaps most useful for the account it provides of the terms of sale of the lands of the Seneca Indians, and for its description of the numerous treaties and negotiations between the state of New York and the state of Massachusetts for the land of the Seneca Indians. Interesting to consider in terms of the loss of "Lamanite" land, to the "Gentiles."
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages): Includes a quote from General Dearborn's journal explaining his feelings regarding the terms of sale for lands of the Seneca tribe.
"Gen. Dearborn observes in his journal that if the same offers were made to any laboring whites which were made by the United States Government to these Indians, they were so liberal that men would abandon any homes to avail themselves of them.
He writes thus upon this branch of the subject:
'To reason with the ignorant, and attempt to do good to the prejudiced, suspicious and most debased of the human species, is to labor without results either gratifying to us or beneficial to them. Here has been a boon offered which would depopulate any country town in New England; and hurry them to the West with glad and grateful hearts; but the miserable savages are incapable of appreciating the generous humanity of the Government.'

As evidence that the Indians were most bountifully dealt with by the United States, the following figures are presented by Gen. Dearborn as the money value of what was offered in exchange for the 119,000 acres of land by the parties interested. They were offered 1,824,000 acres of land at Green Bay, which, at $1.25 an acre, was worth $2,280,000. The amount to be given them in money was $433,500; the amount to be paid them by the Ogden Company was $211,600; the amount for exploration of the new territory was $16,000. This made a total sum of about $3,000,000 to the two tribes." (8) was held by the Manchester Library. The 1962 edition includes an editor's introduction by Victor Wolfgang von Hagen, with maps and engravings by Frederick Catherwood.

Comment: Stephens and Catherwood collaborated on several popular volumes of Incidents of Travel, describing their travel to various locations. Their exploration in Yucatan has been described as the beginnings of American archaeology (see editor's introduction) and this easy-to-read travel narrative posits several interesting theories regarding the ruins of Yucatan and the Mayan people. Additionally, this book describes many ruined churches and temples in great detail.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):
"So when the historian describes the mound as "El grande de los Kú el adorratorio de los idolos," he means to say that it was the great one, or the greatest among the places of worship of the Indians, or the temples of their idols.
It is called the "great one" of their places of worship, in contradistinction to the smaller ones around, among which was that now occupied by the Franciscan convent. In my opinion, the solitary arch found in this convent is very strong, if not conclusive, evidence that all the ruined buildings scattered over Yucatán were erected by the very Indians who occupied the country at the time of the Spanish conquest, or, to fall back upon my old ground, that they were the work 'of the same race of people' or 'their not very distant progenitors.'

Who these races were, when they came, or who were their progenitors, I did not undertake to say, nor do I now." (64; vol. 1)

"On the walls of this desolate edifice were prints of the mano colorada, or red hand. Often as I saw this print, it never failed to interest me. It was the stamp of the living hand; it always brought me nearer to the builders of these cities, and at times, amid stillness, desolation, and ruin, it seemed as if from behind the curtain that concealed them from view was extended the hand of greeting. These prints were larger than any I had seen. In several places I measured them with my own, opening the fingers to correspond with those on the wall. The Indians said it was the hand of the master of the building.

The mysterious interest which, in my eyes, always attached to this red hand, has assumed a more definite shape. I have been advised that in Mr. Catlin's collection of Indian curiosities, made during a long residence among our North American tribes, was a tent presented to him by the chief of the powerful but now extinct race of Mandans which exhibits, among other marks, two prints of the red hand; and I have been farther advised that the red hand is seen constantly upon the buffalo robes and skins of wild animals brought in by the hunters of the Rocky Mountains, and, in fact, that it is a symbol recognized and in common use by the North American Indians of the present day. I do not mention these as facts within my own knowledge, but with the hope of attracting the attention of those who have opportunities and facilities for investigation; and I suggest the interesting consideration that, if true, the red hand on the tent and the buffalo robes points back from the wandering tribes in our country to the comparatively polished people who erected the great cities at the south; and if true that it is at this day used as a sign or symbol by our North American Indians, its meaning can be ascertained from living witnesses, and through ages of intervening darkness a ray of light may be thrown back upon the now mysterious and incomprehensible characters which perplex the stranger on the walls of the desolate southern buildings." (27-28; vol. 2)

Contradictions over the idea of Christianity:

"But I have a particular reason for presenting to the reader this ruined church. It is a notion, or, rather, a principle, pervading all the old Spanish writers that at some early day Christianity had been preached to the Indians, and connected with this is the belief that the cross was found by the first conquerors in the province of Yucatán as a symbol of the Christian worship. Prophecies are recorded supposed to show a traditionary knowledge of its former existence and foretelling that from the rising of the sun should come a bearded people and white, who should carry aloft the sign of the cross, which their gods could not reach and from which they should fly away. The same vague idea exists to this day, and, in general when the padres pay any attention to the antiquities of the country, they are always quick in discovering some real or imaginary resemblance to the cross." (243-244; vol. 2)
"...For myself, I have no doubt of the fact; and I regard it as important, for, even though crosses may have been found in Yucatán, the connecting of the 'Cozumel Cross,' with the ruined church on the island completely invalidates the strongest proof offered at this day that the cross was ever recognized by the Indians as a symbol of worship." Bemis and Co., Canandaigua. The BYU library holds a copy of the 23rd edition. A copy of this book (1826: no additional publication information available) was held by the Manchester Library.
Comment: This book recounts the life of Mrs. Mary Jemison, Her family was killed by Indians and she was taken captive in 1755. She was later adopted into a Seneca tribe, with whom she spent the rest of her life. The narrative provides an interesting look at contemporary New York from a variety of perspectives, along with descriptions of Native American customs and traditions.

Excerpt (pages):

"Her ideas of religion, correspond in every respect with those of the great mass of the Senecas. She applauds virtue, and despises vice. She believes in a future state, in which the good will be happy, and the bad miserable; and that the acquisition of that happiness, depends primarily upon human volition, and the consequent good deeds of the happy recipient of blessedness. The doctrines taught in the Christian religion, she is a stranger to." (Introduction, xxii)

"No people can live more happy than the Indians did in times of peace, before the introduction of spirituous liquors amongst them. Their lives were a continual round of pleasures. Their wants were few, and easily satisfied; and their cares were only for to-day; the bounds of their calculations for future comfort not extending to the incalculable uncertainties of to-morrow. If peace ever dwelt with men, it was in former times, in the recesses from war, amongst what are now termed barbarians. The moral character of the Indians was (if I may be allowed the expression) uncontaminated. Their fidelity was perfect, and became proverbial; they were strictly honest; they despised deception and falsehood; and chastity was held in high veneration, and a violation of it was considered sacrilege. They were temperate in their desires, moderate in their passions, and candid and honorable in the expression of their sentiments on every subject of importance." (72)

Excerpt (pages):
"The politeness of these savages in conversation is indeed carried to excess; since it does not permit them to contradict or deny the truth of what is asserted in their presence. By this means, they, indeed, avoid disputes; but then it becomes difficult to know their minds, or what impression you make upon them. The missionaries, who have attempted to convert them to Christianity, all complain of this as one of the great difficulties of their mission. The Indians hear with patience the truths of the gospel explained to them, and give their usual tokens of assent and approbation: you would think they were convinced. No such matter - it is mere civility." (219-20)

"On the whole, it appears that the Israelites were a people jealous of their newly acquired liberty, which jealousy was in itself no fault: but that, when they suffered it to be worked upon by artful men, pretending public good, with nothing really in view but private interest, they were led to oppose the establishment of the new constitution, whereby they brought upon themselves much inconvenience and misfortune...

To conclude, I beg I may not be understood to infer, that our general convention was divinely inspired when it formed the new federal constitution, merely because that constitution has been unreasonably and vehemently opposed; yet, I must own, I have so much faith in the general government of the world by Providence, that I can hardly conceive a transaction of such momentous importance to the welfare of millions now existing, and to exist in the posterity of a great nation, should be suffered to pass without being in some degree influenced, guided, and governed by that omnipotent, omnipresent, and beneficent Ruler, in whom all inferior spirits live, and move, and have their being.
(228-9)

"Much less is it adviseable [sic] for a person to go thither, who has no other quality to recommend him than his birth. In Europe it has indeed its value; but it is a commodity that cannot be carried to a worse market than to that of America, where people do not inquire concerning a stranger What is he? but What can he do? If he has any useful art he is welcome; and if he exercises it, and behaves well, he will be respected by all that know him: but a mere man of quality, who on that account wants to live upon the public by some office or salary, will be despised and disregarded. The husbandman is in honour there and even the mechanic, because their employments are useful. The people have a saying, that God Almighty is himself a mechanic, the greatest in the universe; and he is respected more for the variety, ingenuity, and utility of his handicraft works, than for the antiquity of his family." (253)

Nature of Source: Subtitled "A Series of Historical Sketches Relative to Onondaga; history of the central New York region, focusing primarily on the Onondaga Indians.

Provides a folk history and descriptions of religious beliefs, along with the traditions of the Onondaga tribe. Based on the author's research and observations. Also includes a contemporary map of the area.
Comment: This book includes interesting chapters entitled "Indians; Traditions of the Onondagas" and "Pagan Rites and Ceremonies." The author compares the rites and ceremonies of the Onondagas to the rites and ceremonies of the Jews, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, eventually arguing against the claim that the origin of the Indians is from the Jews.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):
"There is an opinion prevalent among them, that the evil spirit can be kept at a distance by the application of ashes to the body. As an instance in point, an Indian woman came into the house of a white neighbor one day terribly frightened; she ran to the hearth, spat upon her hands, dipped them in the ashes and with her finger made a cross upon her face; then turning suddenly round exclaimed, "there, I defy you." If we mistake not, here is a relic of ancient Roman Catholic teaching, two hundred years ago - repent in ashes. - remember the cross." (48)

"It is not at all surprising, that a people as wise, warlike, and sagacious, as were the Iroquois, should be marked by peculiar religious institutions. From time immemorial, having been shut out from the lights of civilization and the influences of pure religion, with the traditinary faith of their forefathers always orally transmitted; it is not to be wondered at, that their religious opinions are implicitly believed, most scrupulously adhered to, and practiced with a zeal and fidelity worthy of all commendation. Among the Pagan portion, there is no difference of opinion in religious matters. They are agreed in sentiment; their aim is the public good. Individual virtues are cultivated, and these are explained and illustrated in their pagan ceremonies.

They believe in one Great and Good Spirit, styled in the language of the Onondagas, Ha-wah-ne-u, who is the Creator of the World; the Holder of the Heavens; the Master of Breath; the maker of men and useful animals. He is the controller of events; He rules the destinies of men; supplies them with the comforts and conveniences of life; makes abundance of game in the hunting grounds, and supplies the streams with fish and the air with birds. He is believed to be the peculiar Deity of the red man, and they are his peculiar people." (53)

"Having in a foregoing chapter alluded to the subject of the origin of the Indian nations from the Jews, through Charlevoix, and other authors having affirmed this opinion, it may not be considered improper in this place to note briefly some of the coincidences which may by some be supposed to exist between the rites and observances of the aborigines of our land, (particularly the Onondagas) and those of the Jews, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans." (69)

"We have endeavored to point out a few of the coincidences that may be supposed to exist between some of the ceremonies of the Jews, and those of the Indians, as practiced at Onondaga. We are satisfied that they prove nothing positively as to their origin from that peculiar people. If anything, they may illustrate the common origin of all men, and the high origin of all religious institutions, which at first must have emanated from the same source." (73)

Nature of Source: Written at the request of John Jacob Astor, a personal acquaintance of Washington Irving, this book describes the settlement of Astoria. It includes several maps and descriptions of many Native American tribes and their customs. A copy of this book (Philadelphia: Carey, Lee, and Blanchard, 1836. 2 volumes) was held by the Manchester Library.
Comment: Much of the material in this book is taken from the journals and letters of various "adventurers" and from the travels of Irving personally. It thus describes the west and its people in a rather eclectic way, but provides an interesting look at its development nevertheless.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):
"The religious belief of these people was extremely limited and confined; or rather, in all probability, their explanations were but little understood by their visitors. They had an idea of a benevolent and omnipotent spirit, the creator of all things. They represent him as assuming various shapes at pleasure, but generally that of an immense bird. He usually inhabits the sun, but occasionally wings his way through the aerial regions, and sees all that is doing upon earth. Should anything displease him, he vents his wrath in terrific storms and tempests, the lightning being the flashes of his eyes, and the thunder the clapping of his wings. To propitiate his favor they offer to him annual sacrifices of salmon and venison, the first fruits of their fishing and hunting." (334)
"Polygamy is not only allowed, but considered honorable, and the greater number of wives a man can maintain, the more important is he in the eyes of the tribe. The first wife, however, takes rank of all the others, and is considered mistress of the house. Still the domestic establishment is liable to jealousies and cabals, and the lord and master has much difficulty in maintaining harmony in his jangling household." (335)

Nature of Source: The title page of this book reads, "Remarkable shipwrecks, or a collection of interesting accounts of naval disasters. With many particulars of the extraordinary adventures and sufferings of the crews of vessels wrecked at sea, and of their treatment on distant shores. Together with an account of the deliverance of survivors. Selected from authentic sources." The book discusses several shipwrecks, paying particular attention to methods of survival. A copy of this book was held by the Manchester Library in New York.

Comment: While there is little of doctrinal importance in this book, it does provide a detailed look at interactions between shipwrecked sailors and people who were native to the land. Often, the natives are described as non-Christians. Perhaps the most notable thing about this book, however, is its lack of references to Providence or the Almighty. Interestingly, I did not discover any passages that referred to prayer or to any sense of dependence upon God for survival.

Excerpt (pages):

"The barbarians assembled in the hut where the three captives were, to deliberate upon their fate. Some, conformably with a principle of their religion, advised that they should be put to death, conceiving that the sacrifice of these Christians would insure them the joys of Mahomet's paradise. Others from a principle of interest, and the hope of a great ransom, were of the contrary opinion: thus the assembly broke up without coming to any determination." (19)

"Towards evening they reached a deep gully, which they entered, in the hope of meeting with fresh water. Here they found another of the Grosvenor's crew lying dead, with his right hand cut off at the wrist. A circumstance so singular could not fail to attract the notice of his companions, especially as they recollected that it had been the common assertion of the deceased; - May the devil cut my right arm off if it be not true! It had a sensible effect upon his comrades for a time, as they superstitiously imagined that Providence had interfered, by a miracle, to show its indignation against his profaneness." (81-2)

"These reflections have been extended by considering the circumstances in which the shipwrecked people were placed; from all which it may fairly be concluded, that the greater part might have effected a return to their native land, had they been guided by any idea of the advantages of discipline and subordination. It is to be hoped, then, that the fatal consequences attending disorderly conduct on these calamitous occasions, will impress on the minds of seamen this incontrovertible truth, that their only hope of safety must depend upon obedience." Place of Publication: London
Publisher: C. Rivington, J. Walthoe, T. Woodward
Date of Publication: 1739
Library Location: BYU Special Collections Amer/Rare HQ 991 .D3 1739
Nature of Source: This book argues against the practice of polygamy, supporting its claims by the author's comments on scriptural passages. The second edition includes an explanation of the author's reasons for publishing a book concerning the "unlawfulness" of polygamy. These reasons include a desire to show the insufficiency of man's reason, to vindicate the Scriptures of the Old Testament that have been used to support polygamy, and to show the advantages and blessings that would be brought about by the abolition of polygamy. (See preface.)

Comment: Published in 1739, this book may be a little early for the context of Joseph Smith, but its argument is certainly one that early Saints would have encountered repeatedly. Delany argues that divine law prohibits polygamy, as evidenced by the creation of Adam and Eve. He also suggests that polygamy was not permitted by the law of Moses, and that the Savior's words were against polygamy, which he supports with several passages from Matthew. Discusses the cases of Abraham, Jacob, and David in great detail.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages): Delany believes that God's law excludes polygamy:

"It is also equally certain, that God might as easily have created twenty women for Adam as one; and yet he created Eve only: altho' as the prophet Malachi observeth, he had the residue of the Spirit; the same spirit that empowered him to create one, was equally sufficient for any greater number. A plain demonstration that he never intended more than one woman for one man. And this is fully confirmed by our Saviour.

[Reference in side margin to Matt. 19]" (8)

Delany suggests that polygamy places women in a position of servitude:

"Another argument against polygamy is, that miserable state of servitude to which the whole female world are reduced, where-ever it obtaineth... To this it may be objected, that women are doomed to subjection by God himself. I answer, To subjection, but not to slavery. And God forbid, this distinction should ever cease, any more in the married, than in the civil society." (24)

Seems to support the idea of continuing revelation from God

"All then that can be inferred from this practice of the patriarchs and prophets, to the disadvantage of the Scriptures, is this; that God Almighty did not think fit to reveal his will, as clearly and fully upon this head, either before, or under the dispensation of the Old testament, as under that of the New... And will any man of candour and consideration say, that God is obliged to prevent such corruptions? Or, that he is obliged to reveal his will equally at all times, and in all places, to all mankind? (39)

Abraham:

"God's promise to Abraham must be made good: this was the only natural and probable way, in which it could be made good; she only had a right to her husband; she desireth to transfer that right; and it was transferred no longer than she desired it. I will not take upon me, strictly to justify this conduct: if we are to speak to this point as Christians, Sarai must be owned guilty of a wrong desire; and Abraham criminal, in complying with it: (and each of then had very soon to repent); but this I will say, that Polygamy cannot derive any advantage, or encouragement from this example; and yet, this is the only imputation of licentiousness, that resteth upon the character of Abraham.

(Nota: the BYU library holds a 1967 edition of The Commerce of the Prairies, edited by Milo Milton Quaife and published by the University of Nebraska Press.)
Nature of Source: This popular book was written by explorer Josiah Gregg, who originally traveled the Santa Fe trail in the hopes of improving his failing health. The 1844 edition was subtitled, "The journal of a Santa Fe trader during eight expeditions across the Great Western Prairies, and a residence of nearly nine years in Northern Mexico." It includes a first-hand narrative concerning the Santa Fe trail, along with several maps and illustrations. A copy of this book, in two volumes, was held by the Manchester (New York) Library.
Comment: Pages 163-170 of this book deal specifically with Latter-day Saints in Missouri. Gregg provides an interesting perspective on events that occurred in Independence, Clay County, and Nauvoo. His primary complaints about Mormonism seem to stem from the practice of plural marriage and the refusal to sell property in Missouri.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):
Footnote added by the editor to Gregg's discussion of Mormonism:
"The sketch of early Mormonism which follows is animated by the prejudice entertained by Gregg's fellow-gentile Missourians toward the obnoxious sect. It is in many respects inadequate, viewed as a history of Mormonism in Missouri, yet it is valuable from the viewpoint of reflecting contemporary gentile opinion on the subject."
(Pg. 163, note 65)
"The new-comers also drew upon themselves much animadversion in consequence of the immorality of their lives, and in particular their disregard for the sacred rites of marriage. Still they continued to spread and multiply, not by conversion but by immigration, to an alarming extent; and in proportion as they grew strong in numbers they also became more exacting and bold in their pretensions. In a little paper printed at Independence under their immediate auspices everything was said that could provoke hostility between the Saints and their worldly neighbors, until at last they became so emboldened by impunity as openly to boast of their determination to be the sole proprietors of the Land of Zion; a revelation to that effect having been made to their prophet." (164-5)

"They appear to have set the laws of the state at defiance, and to have acted so turbulently throughout that Governor Boggs deemed it necessary to order out a large force of state militia to subject them: which was easily accomplished without bloodshed. From that time the Mormons have harbored a mortal enmity towards the Governor: and the attempt which was afterwards made to assassinate him at Independence is generally believed to have been instigated, if not absolutely perpetrated, by that deluded sect." (169)

"Before concluding this chapter it may be proper to remark that the Mormons have invariably refused to sell any of the property they had acquired in Missouri, but have on the contrary expressed a firm determination to reconquer their lost purchases. Of these, a large lot, situated on an elevated point at Independence, known as the Temple Lot, upon which the Temple of Zion was to have been raised, has lately been profaned by cultivation, having been converted into a corn-field." (170)

A copy of this book (published in 1842) was held by the Manchester New York Library.

Comment: The stated intent of this book is to educate citizens of the United States about their rights and responsibilities. It discusses and defines principles of government -- such as natural, civil, political and religious rights and liberties -- along with more specific functions of the U.S. government. The section on principles of government seems most relevant to ideas of "government" and the divine mission of the United States in LDS doctrine. "20. The law of nature, as applied to man, is a rule of action arising out of the natural relations which he sustains to his Creator and to his fellow men. As a creature, he must be subject to the laws of his Creator, on whom he is dependent. The will of the Creator is his law, and is called the law of nature. This law is founded in those relations of justice which existed in the nature of things prior to any positive precept; that is, it is a perfect rule for all rational and moral beings, and is right in itself, without depending on any positive command to make it so. It is that eternal law of right to which God himself conforms. Man, as a social being, is subject to the same law. He is in a measure dependent on his fellow beings..."
21. The law of revelation is that which is found in the Holy Scriptures, in which Divine Providence has directly revealed his will to mankind. This law is designed to aid man, in his present imperfect state, in acquiring a knowledge of his duty to his Maker, and to his fellow men. This revealed or divine law agrees with the original law of nature. Both originate from the same source, are equally binding, and tend alike to promote the good of mankind. All human laws derive their force from the laws of nature and revelation; and so far as they are contrary to the natural or divine law, they are not morally binding upon men." (19-20)

Comment: Extensive treatment of the Mormons in Illinois, particularly interesting as the history is written by the man who was governor at the time of the martyrdom of Joseph Smith. Ford discusses Mormon history and doctrine from his personal position as a politician, and is interested in Joseph Smith as the mayor of Nauvoo, in the voting tendencies of the Mormons, and in what he views as an attempt at self-government by the Mormons. Contains chapters entitled, "Civil and Religious Discord, 1841-1842," "Politics and Mormonism, 1843-1844," "The Downfall of Joseph Smith, 1844-1845," and "Expulsion of the Mormons, 1845-1846."

Excerpt (pages):

"The Book of Mormon pretended to reveal the fulness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ as he delivered it to his people in America. It was to be brought forth by the power of God and carried to the Gentiles, of whom many were to receive it; and after this the seed of Israel were to be brought into the fold also. It was pretended that pristine Christianity was to be restored, with the gift of prophecy and the gift of tongues, with the laying on of hands to cure all manner of diseases. Many were the pretended prophets which this sect brought forth. (53)"
"Here [Independence], by pretending that the Lord had given them all that country, and in fact the whole world, they being his saints, and by some petty offences, and by their general tone of arrogance, the neighboring people became much excited against them. Some of them were ducked in the river; some were tarred and feathered and others killed... (54)

Ford consistently maintains that he interested in the politics, rather than the religion, of the Mormons.

"However, in this history I have nothing to do with the religious, but only the political considerations connected with this people." (60)

Ford's description of the practice of plural marriage:

"A doctrine was now revealed that no woman could get to heaven except as the wife of a Mormon elder. The elders were allowed to have as many of these wives as they could maintain; and it was a doctrine of the church, that any female could be 'sealed up to eternal life' by uniting herself as wife or concubine to the elder of her choice." (160)

Ford's reaction to the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith:

"A short time before sundown we departed on our return to Carthage. When we had proceeded two miles we met two individuals, one of them a Mormon, who informed us that the Smiths had been assassinated in jail, about five or six o'clock of that day. The intelligence seemed to strike everyone with a kind of dumbness. As to myself, it was perfectly astounding; and I anticipated the very worst consequences from it. The Mormons had been represented to me as a lawless, infatuated, and fanatical people, not governed by the ordinary motives which influence the rest of mankind. If so, most likely an exterminating war would ensue and the whole land wold be covered with desolation." (203)

Place of Publication: Hartford
Publisher: Hudson & Goodwin
Date of Publication: 1797
Library Location: Microfiche 080 Sh 64 EVANS 32820
Nature of Source: This collection of sermons was compiled by the Reverend Ephraim Judson at the request of the Litchfield North Association of Ministers. The Ashael Hook sermon includes a discussion of liberty and accountability, within the context of grace and election. Hook takes as his texts Revelations 22:17 ("Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.") and Romans 9:16 ("So then, it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth but of God, that sheweth mercy.") and attempts to explain the apparent contradictions between them.

Comment: This sermon focuses on man's ability to make choices, and stresses the importance of missionary work, that those who would make righteous choices might have the opportunity to do so. It refers repeatedly to "those who hear the Gospel" and are then able to accept or reject it, but a significant omission is the state of those who are not presented with the gospel in this life.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages):
"The holy scriptures being given by inspiration of God, the passages here selected, though apparently contradictory, are perfectly harmonious and consistent, in their real meaning. The former of them expresses the universal and indiscriminate freeness, with which salvation is offered to sinners. Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. The latter most explicitly declares men's dependence on God, for salvation. So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. - From the two passages, thus briefly explained, we derive the following sentiments: That the salvation of the gospel is freely offered to fallen men; - That, nevertheless, their acceptation and final enjoyment of it depends essentially on God; - That such dependence is consistent with their moral liberty and accountableness; and with sincerity in the offer." (291-2)

"Men's choice is the turning point, between receiving, and not receiving, the blessings of the gospel. The awful question, therefore, respecting the salvation of the soul, has their decision, according as they approve, or disapprove, the gracious terms of forgiveness and life. Accordingly, the gospel makes a free offer of eternal mercy, to all who hear it." (294)

"ELECTION, in the sense of the scriptures, is not an arbitrary act of will, by which the Divine Disposer, without good and sufficient reasons for so doing, predestinated some of mankind to salvation, when he might, as well, have saved their whole number. But, it is the infinite goodness of JEHOVAH, determining, for the best possible reasons, to save so many of fallen men, as may consist with a most glorious display of his perfections, and the highest happiness of his moral kingdom." (309)

"Ere long, the Son of God will be revealed, to avenge the contempt of his gospel, on all the finally impenitent. The brightness of his appearing will disclose the falacy [sic] of all excuses. Every mouth will be stopped. And when the judgment is set and the books are opened, every man will receive according to his works." (314)

The Brief Remarker on the Ways of Man: Or Compendious Dissertations, Respecting Social and Domestic Relations and Concerns, and the various Economy of Life

"Of excessive and indiscriminate Novel Reading"

Hudson, New York

Stone & Cross

1818

Microfiche 080 Sh64a no. 45630

"The Brief Remarker" was originally published as a series of columns in the Connecticut Courant. The essays were then collected by the author and published in book form. The book was published in Hudson, New York, in 1818, notable in its proximity to the Prophet Joseph Smith. "Of excessive and indiscriminate Novel reading" is essay number XCVIII in the series. Though not directly religious in nature, Sampson's comments are concerned with the moral implications of reading and the process of gaining knowledge.

Comment: Sampson expresses concern that the novels being read by American youth in what he calls "the age of Novels and of Novelists" have the potential to be morally dangerous. He describes six major harms of novel reading: 1. Novels do not encourage pure Christian morals, but morals of a much baser sort. 2. There is danger in cultivating the imagination too much. 3. Novels paint a picture of high, and not common life, providing no practical use for most readers. 4. Readers develop extravagant expectations, causing them to be dissatisfied with things they can actually attain. 5. Excessive novel reading decreases the reader's energy for other labors, and decreases interest in sober history. 6. Novel reading encourages the development of a "nauseously sweet" sensibility.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages): Published shortly before Moroni's first visit to Joseph Smith, this essay addresses the reading habits of youth and the tendencies of contemporary writers; Sampson's arguments are interesting to consider in light of the Book of Mormon.

"We have the highest of all authorities for the use of Parables: they have been made the vehicle for conveying moral truth in the most cogent and captivating, and at the same time the most inoffensive manner. Apologues and fables are worthy of praise rather than blame, if framed with ingenuity, and made of manifest tendency to promote good morals." (345)

"Those novels which paint the manners and character of the body and mankind, and affect the reader with the relation of misfortunes which may befal [sic] himself, may be perused, now and then, not only as an amusement, but as a profitable study; - yet, after all, it is real life with which we must chiefly have to do." Though not directly religious in nature, Sampson's comments are concerned with the moral implications of reading and the process of gaining knowledge.
Comment: The essay begins with this quote from Lord Bacon, "Read not to contradict or confute, nor to believe and take for granted, but to weigh and consider." Sampson comments on the increase of reading seen in the previous century, suggesting both that reading is one of the principal keys of knowledge, and that a super-abundance of books has led to a practices of superficial reading. He criticizes readers for treating books as idle amusements and not as objects of serious study, arguing that readers should be cautious in the books they read and the ways they read them. Compare D&C 88: 118.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages): Sampson suggests that the object of reading is to develop wisdom and virtue, rather than to become learned.

"The use of reading, is to render one more wise and virtuous, rather than more learned; and that point is to be gained not so much from the quantity, as the quality of the books we peruse. No single individual has leisure enough, nor is any life long enough for a thorough perusal of even the tenth part of the books now extant in the English language. A selection is therefore necessary, and much depends upon making it judiciously." (343)

"The proper object of reading is not merely to inform us of what others think, but also to furnish us with materials for thinking ourselves, or for the employ and exercise of our judgments and understandings, and of the whole of our intellectual and moral faculties. It is not enough that it supplies us with a multitude of facts; for the knowledge of facts is valuable to us chiefly for the inferences that we ourselves may draw from them, or because they furnish us with the means of exercising and exerting our own powers in the way of comparing, reasoning, and judging, and of drawing sound conclusions of the future from the past." This pamphlet describes in great detail a "field-meeting" held near the Connecticut river in the town of Haddam, on September 25, 1803. The gathering is thought by the author to be the first such meeting held in the state. While many are described as newly converted and sanctified by the gospel of Christ, the story focuses on the conversion of Miss Nabby Frothington (Middletown, Connecticut; 1785-1808) who had recently passed away and was apparently the author's daughter. Includes a letter written by Nabby Frothington shortly before her death that describes her feelings about Christ and heaven.

Comment: An interesting look at God's grace and the process of forgiveness, written from a Methodist perspective. Also describes the domestic life of one converted to Christ.

Researcher: Traci Thomas

Excerpt (pages): This story of conversion shows similarities with two Book of Mormon incidents, the "wrestle" Enos has before God prior to the forgiveness of his sins, and occasions when converts are physically overcome and fall to the ground.

Enos: "...thinking she should never find mercy; consequently rose from her knees and left the room, went out into the solitary field alone, spent some time contemplating and bemoaning her case before the Lord, thought she would once more kneel down and supplicate the throne of grace for the healing of her sin-sick soul, when a gleam of encouragement seemed to spring up in her mind, that in persevering she might obtain pardon." (6)

"If in the course of the day any clouds or gloom rested on her mind, she would retire to her closet, and there pour out her complaints, and especially at class-meetings (which she seldom failed to attend) would wrestle till she obtained a blessing, and then she would frequently burst out in floods of joy, till overwhelmed with the spirit of God." (10)

Converts falling to the ground: "Numbers more were brought into liberty - and some lay prostrate, being so overcome with the power of God that they were unable to rise." (6)

"...and although some had not their bodily strength taken from them, yet they were on their knees, crying to God for the pardon of their sins; and the Lord, in condescending mercy, heard and answered their prayers, by letting down his holy spirit in an extraordinary manner; and such cries, groans and tears, prayers and shouts, perhaps never was heard amongst so small a number, consisting of so many different denominations." 2. A Religious Conversation excited and assisted. From, Mal. 3. 16.
3. The great Duty of Self-Examination urged on the Professors of Religion; and

   The sermons were written by Israel Loring, pastor of a church in Sudbury, Boston. This entry focuses on the first discourse.
Comment: Loring's discourse on "The Glories of the Heavenly World" speaks in detail of the body putting on incorruption and becoming perfected, a change made possible through the Atonement of Christ. Loring describes heaven as a place of perfect love, where saints will love and serve one another and the God they have come to resemble.
   He also speaks of different "degrees of glory" although his use of this phrase is different from an LDS connotation. Loring's picture of heaven is very interesting to consider and compare with LDS notions of eternal life and of temple ordinances. This discourse also includes a conversion story that is reminiscent of Alma the younger.

Comment: The first lecture in this volume, "Of matter, and a material world," explicates verses from Genesis about the creation. Good maintains that it was, in fact, possible for the Creator to create something from nothing and refutes three main oppositions to this argument: an absolute and independent eternity of matter, its emanation from the essence of the Creator, and the non-existence of a material world. Other lectures focus on the idea of the soul, animal life, voice and language, human happiness, and free-agency of the mind.
Researcher: Traci Thomas
Excerpt (pages):

"One of the first inquiries that can ever press upon the mind must relate to the nature of MATTER, and the origin of the world around us: what is this common substance from which every thing visible has proceeded, and to which every thing visible is reducible? has it existed from all eternity? or has it been called into being by the voice of an Omnipotent Creator? and in any case, has it uniformly exhibited its present harmony and arrangement, or has there been a period in which it was destitute of form and order, a waste and shapeless chaos?" (26)
"Words are not invented for an exclusive expression of solitary facts, but for general use. The creation of the world, or any thing whatever, out of nothing, is a fact of this kind; and no language ever had or ever will have a term precisely struck out for the purpose of representing such an idea, and exclusively appropriated to it: and assuredly there could be no such word at the time Moses first spoke of the fact, and communicated the doctrine; as, antecedently to this, it could not have been called for." (28)

"It tells us, in words that cannot lie, that the soul is immortal from its birth; that the strong and inextinguishable desire we feel of future being is the true and natural impulse of a high-born and inextinguishable principle: and that the blow which prostrates the body and imprisons it in the grave, gives pinions to the soaring spirit, and crowns it with freedom and triumph. But this is not all: it tells us, too, that gross matter itself is not necessarily corruptible: that the freedom and triumph of the soul shall hereafter be extended to the body; that this corruptible shall put on incorruption, this mortal immortality, and a glorious and beatified reunion succeed. By what means such reunion is to be accomplished, or why such separation should be necessary, we know not, - for we know not how the union was produced at first. They are mysteries that yet remain locked up in the bosom of the great Creator, and are as inscrutable to the sage as to the savage, to the philosopher as to the schoolboy; - they are left, and perhaps purposely, to make a mock at all human science; and while they form the groundwork of man's future happiness, forcibly to point out to him that his proper path to it is through the gate of humility." Idea that men are made in the image of God:

"God made man after his own image, but he has sought out many inventions; there is a strange propensity in the human mind to deviate from the truth, and to the divine simplicity of holy ordinances mankind are too apt to join something very pleasing to their own imperfect ideas; to captivate the mind, without tending either to improve the morals in this life, or to make the soul wise for happiness hereafter. The more we know of all the religions of different nations, the more we are led to enquire, what could induce some men to act so inconsistent with the dignity of their nature?" (Preface iii)

Nature of Source: This book was written by Ethan Smith, also the author of View of the Hebrews, to which the Book of Mormon has often been compared by critics. A Key to the Figurative Language Found in the Sacred Scriptures is written in the form of questions and answers, and includes some introductory remarks. The book also includes an alphabetical index of symbols that are explained by Smith, as well as an initial list of questions that is helpful in locating specific symbols. This book was sold by C. Norris and Co. at their bookstore, and also by E. Little & Co.

Comment: Smith begins by explaining the importance of figurative or symbolic language to the scriptures, and goes on to discuss and define many specific symbols that relate to the earth, the heavens (sun, moon, stars), temples, the body, domestic relations, and animals etc. The final "questions" deal primarily with issues relating to the book of Revelations, while earlier passages on trees and vineyards might be valuably compared to Jacob chapter 5.

Excerpt (pages):
"Q. 115. What is imported by God's planting in the wilderness the cedar, the myrtle and the oil tree; and setting in the desert other kinds of trees, of different natures, together; that they may see and know, and understand together, that God has done this: Isai. xli. 19.20?
A. These things denote the propagation of christianity [sic] through pagan lands: or the bringing of the different heathen nations to the knowledge and obedience of the Christian faith." (44)
"Q. 137. What is symbolized by a temple?
A. The residing tokens of the divine presence; heaven...
"Q. 149. Who are symbolized by oxen?
A. The ministers of the gospel... Oxen then, in that passage of the law, were symbols of the ministers of God's sanctuary. The twelve brazen oxen, bearing the great layer in the ancient Jewish temple, are thought to have been symbols of the ministers of Christ, bearing (under divine commissions) the blessed apparatus of Gospel Grace." (67-68)
"Q. 209. What is symbolized by a key?
A. A power to do an important thing: as Christ has power to save and to destroy; - to kill, and to raise from the dead...." (73)

Nature of Source: This essay was originally published in 1705. It was republished in book form in 1999, along with Daniel DeFoe's "Essay Upon Literature" and an introduction by Joel Reid. Toland's essay is based upon his travels and observations in India. It compares East-Indian customs with certain customs of the Jews, including circumcision, sacrifices, temples, and the general manner of living.
Comment: Toland remarks that he is interested only in explaining the similarities between the customs of the East Indians and the customs of the Jews, and not in explaining how those similarities came to be. He does, however, suggest two possible explanations: 1) a group of people whose travels took them close enough to the Indies that they were able to communicate with the people there; 2) God providing similar commandments to different groups of people. Nature of Source: This book is a collection of pieces originally published in The Farmer's Museum newspaper. Selected by an unnamed editor as being "favorites," the collection includes several essays written by the Lay Preacher, along with various other essays, biographies, and works of poetry. Entries are without original publication dates.

Comment: Attributed to the Lay Preacher, the short essay, "Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine?" asserts a claim of seership and seems to position the author as a sort of prophet, with the ability to warn others of danger. With its emphasis on seers, visions, and predictions, the essay could be described as anti-Enlightenment. See pages 20-24.

Excerpt (pages): The author claims to have visionary experiences, but insists that he despises sorcery and uses his powers only for good.

"Of one species of Highland lore I fairly inherit a small portion. I allude to the gift of SECOND SIGHT. I am sometimes favoured with a partial glimpse of futurity, and through the mists and fog of present time can see a little beyond. One of my forefathers was a seer... I have, in a moderate degree, the prescience of my progenitors." (21)

"I utterly disclaim all pretensions to sorcery, and exercise my gift of second mankind... My objects are higher, and of a character more useful; to warn the thoughtless, to rouse the lazy, to discover merit, and detect danger." (22)

"I have strained my second sight upon one of our highest mountains, and find no

Nature of Source: Written by Bunyan (1628-1688) after he had contemplated suicide and was visited by an angel. Bunyan is shown extensive visions of heaven and of hell, and talks at length with Elijah, an earthly friend, and his own mother.
Comment: The beginning of this narrative is somewhat similar to the Joseph Smith story, with John Bunyan going into a wood and seeing a heavenly messenger. Bunyan's vision of heaven, however, differs significantly from LDS doctrine, as all worldly relations and the differences between males and females are described as ceasing in the afterlife.

Excerpt (pages):

"Now, whilst my thoughts were taken up with these meditations, as I sat upon the bank, I was suddenly surrounded with a glorious light, the exceeding brightness whereof was such as I had never seen any thing like it before This both surprised and amazed me, and while I was wondering from whence it came, I saw towards me a glorious appearance, representing the person of a man, but circled round about with lucid beams of inexpressible light and glory, which streamed from him all the way he came... I soon found I had no more strength in me, and so fell flat down upon my face; but by the kind assistance of his arm, I was soon set upon my feet again, and new strength was put into me..." (13-14)
"And can you think (said the prophet [Elijah]) that the divine goodness will deal so differently with them, that the soul should be everlastingly happy, and the body be lost in forgetfulness? the one glorified in heaven, the other remain in the dust? From the first setting out in the world below to the grave, they both ran the same race, and therefore shall enjoy the same reward." (50)

"But in this happy place, worldly relations cease. Nor is there male and female here, but all are like the angels; for souls cannot be distinguished into sexes; and therefore all relations here are swallowed up in God." (104)

"What is there more delightful to the soul than knowledge? And you may soon think how vast a field we have to trace in it. And as our knowledge does increase, so do the adorations we pay to the divine author of it: For this is our peculiar happiness, that all our disquisitions here, of whatsoever kind, tend to illustrate the high praise and adoration of the ineffable Three-One." Sarah Wegener
"What do Christians have to do with that antiquated volume?":
Nineteenth Century Protestant Views of Christ in the Old Testament

In the first half of the nineteenth century Parson Weems stated, "...this is the very season and age of the Bible. Bible Dictionaries, Bible tales, Bible stories-bibles plan or paraphrased, Carey's Bibles, Collin's Bibles, Clarke's Bibles, Kimptor's Bibles, no matter what or whose, all, all will go down-so wide is the crater of public appetite at this time."1 As Parson Weems suggested, there were dozens of commentators, each presenting different angles on controversial issues of interpretation. One of the biggest of these issues was determining how Old Testament Judaism related to Christianity. Earlier Americans had seen themselves as part of the Old Testament narrative, but nineteenth century religious movements were more focused on the New Testament. Because of this changed focus their interpretations tended to limit the use of the Old Testament, singling out only Christian aspects. The early LDS Church was very involved with these debates. Their new records (the Book of Mormon, the books of Abraham and Moses, and Joseph Smith's retranslations of the bible) made Old Testament world very Christian. This was not just an appearance, in their accounts Adam was baptized in Christ's name, Moses talked with Christ face to face, and the God of the Old Testament was revealed as Jesus Christ. How different was this from what LDS converts had understood prior to their conversion about Christ's role in the Old Testament? Did Christ play an important role in Protestant's interpretation of the Old Testament? The answer to these questions is complex. The long-standing tradition of Christ pervading all scripture seems to make Mormon's focus on Christianity in the Old Testament less startling. But when compared to contemporary biblical interpretations, such as typology, premillennialism, postmillennialism, and scientific criticism, Mormon's understanding of Christ in the Old Testament was not only radically different, but also counter to prevailing trends.

Early nineteenth century Protestant's focus on an emotional Christianity, drawn from the New Testament, led to the development of interpretive strategies bringing the Old Testament in line with their religious understanding. This limited the use of traditional methods, such as typology, for viewing Christ in the Old Testament. Typology had been the primary Protestant method of biblical interpretation, since the Reformation. But while typology lost its prominence, aspects of it remained in nineteenth century conceptions of Christ in the Old Testament. Its roots were in the New Testament, where Paul commented "...death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come." This scripture illustrates a typological relationship, with Adam and Moses, the types, representing and prefiguring Christ, the fulfiller of the type or the anti-type. The connection between an object, person, or event in the Old Testament, and Christ or something in the future was the fundamental basis of typology. Types were shadows or signs of things to come, given as examples and instruction to mankind in the Old Testament.

Protestants viewed typology as necessary because of their concept of time as a progression of dispensations, or epochs. According to their beliefs, people in dispensations shadowed by the Fall were of limited intellectual or spiritual capacity, and had to be taught like children. As a result God developed types to teach the Hebrews religion, to make up for their inability to understand the full glory of Christ. It was only through these "...represensations (sic) of absent objects by sensible signs and tokens," that they could learn about Christ because, "All the types of the holy Scriptures relate to Jesus Christ, in his whole character and work, as their grand object." Types were only shadows of the real thing, the anti-type, and so they were viewed as "... a rough draught, or less accurate model, from which a more perfect image is made." These typological models tied Christ to the Old Testament, a connection that was traced through whole bible dictionaries, commentaries, and companions illustrating and listing the myriad types of Christ. It was not only people who were types, they believed "every religious rite, every noted person and event, observable therein (the Old Testament), may justly be considered...as a TYPE, A FIGURE, a SUBSTANTIAL PREDICTION, of good things to come." This same author lists people, such as Adam and Boaz, who pre-figure Christ by their holiness, objects, such as Noah's Ark, whose saving of mankind prefigures Christ's, and events, like the Hebrew's travels in the wilderness.

Typological interpreters saw Christ throughout the Old Testament. As one writer declared: "It is evident, that JESUS CHRIST is the great subject of the scriptures of the Old and New Testament; particularly of the Psalms." However, this view of Christ's presence is primarily the result of their consciously reading Christ into the Old Testament. As William Jones, a respected Anglican cleric, stated "If a man hears the Bible all his life with a Jewish mind, he will know no more of it at last than the Jews do. The son of Adam will be left as ignorant as the son of Abraham, unless his heart and understanding are opened to admit the principles of the Christian Revelation." Typological interpreters saw Christ in the Old Testament because they were Christian, not necessarily because He was there in ancient times. Because they founded their study of the Old Testament on the assumption that "Christ Jesus being the great subject and end of scripture revelation, we ought every where to search if we can find him..."\textsuperscript{10} they ended finding examples of His presence throughout the scriptures.

This understanding of Christ's position in the Old Testament was quite different from Mormon views. For while both perspectives saw Christ as important in the Old Testament, Mormons understood Christ to be present in a much broader sense. They saw His presence as more than just an allegory or type, but as a historical reality as well. In Moses chapter five, Adam learns not only that his sacrifice is "a similitude" of Christ's, which is a typological understanding, but he is also taught its significance by Jesus Christ, Himself.\textsuperscript{11} This account is profoundly different from traditional typological views, which held that Adam was the unknowing representation of Christ, possessed of Christian aspects only obvious to believers in Christ. The broad view of traditional typology, encompassing the prophetic role and the idea of gradual revelation, became less prominent in the early nineteenth century. However, its use as a tool to see Christ in the Old Testament remained important.

Typology traditionally connected the Old and New Testaments by linking prophetic types of Christ in the Old with their fulfillment in the New. However, in the early nineteenth century, some individuals limited the use of traditional typology by focusing on its prophetic aspect. Like Mormons, these premillennial theorists, focused on prophecies that had yet to be fulfilled. But while they both dwelt on "... signs and figures of things not seen as yet...(of which) many...are in force as such, at this hour,"\textsuperscript{12} Mormons did not limit their focus on Christ to prophecy, as other interpretations did. To clarify, The term premillennialist was adopted, by its proponents, because of their belief "...that Christ will actually, and personally, and visibly, be revealed from heaven, at the commencement of the Millennium (which we further believe to be very near at hand), to take possession of the promised land...." \textsuperscript{13} These interpreters observed that "...prophecy is sometimes typical; that is, partly fulfilled in the type, but completely only in the antitype."\textsuperscript{14} "Antitypes" were the fulfillment of the typological predictions of the Old Testament. Many antitypes were found in the New Testament, because Christ was the fulfillment of much of what types prophesied. Not all types, however, had an antitype, indicating to interpreters that they had not all come to pass. Looking for events and ideas pointing towards His imminent return, they focused more on Christ's future, than His presence in scriptural times. Their attitude had a significant impact on their view of Christ in the Old Testament, focusing attention on prophecy in scripture and its present fulfillment.

While premillennialists used typology to look for present antitypes of the types in the bible, they did not view scripture solely as a series of types. Instead they saw both the Old and New Testaments as possessing a continual stream of prophecy foretelling the second coming of Christ. Types were just one way prophecy was expressed. Using types and traditional apocalyptic prophecy from the Bible, they decided the end of the world, and Christ's return, was imminent. They observed, that as a result,"... prophecies... should be more diligently studied, and better understood."\textsuperscript{15}

Since premillennialists read the Old and New Testaments very literally as sources for prophecy, they needed to see both as equally valid. In order to justify the two testament's equality they abandoned dispensational ideas of a gradual progression of mankind from a fallen state. Instead, they conceived of biblical history, and world history, as one long continuous story, where Christ is revealed to man in the Old Testament as in the New. They claimed that, "in contemplating the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, a careful observer will necessarily remark, not only on an uniformity of design, but also one continued well organized system of conduct, established from the beginning of the world, and predicted to continue to the end of it."16
The majority of premillennialists believed revelation did not continue after Christ, because all of the instructions they needed were in the prophecies contained in the Bible. They saw these applying to themselves because they were Christian, justifying that "...although the Israelites had certainly an interest in the promise...they were not the Seed to whom that promise was especially made. ...Christ was the Seed to whom the promise (of an inheritance) was especially made; and not either Isaac or Jacob...or to their descendants the Jews."17

Mormons also drew a connection between the promises of the Old Testament and themselves. Additionally, Joseph Smith believed, as the premillennialists, in a very literal reading of scripture, observing that it should be "understood precisely as it reads."18 Early Mormons were also anxious for the second coming of Christ, and looked avidly for "signs of the times." There were, however, fundamental differences between the majority of premillennialists and Mormons. One was the LDS view of continuing revelation, which effected the way they looked for Christ's second coming. When William Miller claimed Christ would be returning in 1843, Joseph Smith confidently denied it, stating "...the Lord hath not shown me any such sign...."19

Another significant difference was that Mormon's saw Christ as having a much larger active role in the Old Testament: He was not just spoken of in prophecy, He was frequently the one speaking. Premillennialist's study of scripture focused on Christ, but more specifically prophecy, as they identified "...two important points to which all prophecy seems to centre...the first and second coming of Christ."20 This quote illustrates how the premillennialists limited their focus on Christ, throughout the whole scriptures, to prophecy. They saw Christ when they studied the Old Testament, but in a limited capacity as the object of prophecy.

While Premillennialists were a little respected minority in the first half of the nineteenth century, they were not the only ones using limited aspects of typology to focus on Christ in the Old Testament. The majority of biblical interpretation focused around dispensational typology, which, unlike Mormon concepts of dispensations, limited Christ's presence in the scriptural narrative. Their theory of dispensations held that humanity has "...gradually increased from very small beginnings, till through the successive labors of above four thousand years it reached its finished state."21 While advancing towards perfection, the world went through a series of three or four periods, called dispensations. These were: the Patriarchic, the Mosaic, and the Christian. In the earliest dispensations man was under the shadow of the fall, and so was taught in types Looking upon the present advanced state of humanity, they saw the pinnacle of perfection within reach. But it was not just humanity becoming more advanced. They saw "progressive evolution [as] a distinguishing feature of all the plans of God... This unchanging trait of universal nature is known to pervade the religion of the Bible."22 Dispensational thought saw Christ as the fulfillment not necessarily of prophecy, but of years of preparation. He came to earth as the perfected anti-type that the dispensations of the Old Testament were not ready to see or know. Because they could only receive Him in shadow, or in simplified terms, the Old Testament was less important because it contained less truth, and Christ had a lesser role in it. Although dispensational theology did not consider the Old Testament terribly important, they still studied it. They claimed that, "the Law of Moses, though not absolutely perfect, had a perfection suited to its kind and design. It was at the same time ordained to pre-signify good things to come, and to bear a strong attestation to the truth of the Christian Religion." These dispensationalists continued studying Old Testament scriptures because they helped support the truths they already knew as Christians. However, much of their religious focus was on action and feeling rather than thought.

Mormons also spoke of dispensations, but their understanding of them, and of Christ's role in them, was profoundly different. L. Tom Perry explained the Mormon understanding, defining a dispensation as "a period of time in which the Lord has at least one authorized servant on the earth who bears the keys of the holy priesthood." In each of these dispensations, as understood by Mormons, "the gospel is revealed anew so that the people of that dispensation do not have to depend on past dispensations for knowledge." This is a profoundly different conception, contrasting with the Protestant majority's view of a series of dispensations in which humanity is improving towards perfection.

The difference between the majority of Protestant's and Mormon's conceptions of dispensations in Biblical history, is key to understanding both the position they give Christ and their understanding of His second coming. The form of progressive typology used in Protestant dispensational thought lent itself to millennial theory, but of a very different form then pre-millennialism or of Mormon millenarianism. Post-millennialism, as dispensational millennial thought was called, focused on the progress of perfection that was taking place in society. They were, as one contemporary observer described, "a system which holds out the prospect...of a gradual spread of religion by the instrumentality of human means... previous to his second coming...to work wonderful changes, and to bring on a kind of millennium of science and knowledge and intellectual refinement... to produce (the) ... reign of universal happiness, peace, and glory." Like the premillenialists, postmillenialist's focus on events that must occur before Christ's return overshadowed other aspects of the scriptures. The postmillennialists, however, were committed to improving the world, preparing it for Christ's second coming. In order to hasten His return, they needed to create a New Testament form of Christianity, which involved an emotional conversion and beneficial social action. They worried about what they did and felt, rather than worrying over what they should think. As a result, most of their writings were dedicated to their plans for improving the world, or their emotional conversions, with relatively little intellectual or biblical justification. When they did talk about the bible, they were interested only in those aspects that they considered Christian. They believed there were lessons supporting Christianity, and Christ's mission in all of the scriptures. However, the religious structure they were trying to emulate was the perfected one given by Christ in the New Testament, which made it more important in their minds. The Old Testament was retained because of the moral lessons, and its attestation of Christianity.

Postmillennial thought was concerned with improving humanity through faith in Christ, knowledge, and service. Unfortunately some found that more knowledge equaled less faith. To reconcile the new science and learning with faith, typological and literal interpretations of the Old Testament were sometimes abandoned. Instead individuals developed spiritual interpretations by denying the literal meaning of the text. They saw the Old Testament "...freed from the shackles of superstition--as the chart of the SOUL, a history of the PATH TO HEAVEN." This view does not actually take Christ from the Old Testament; it allows Him to be there even more, because it is connected less to what the text says and more to the interpreter's thoughts about it.

A spiritual interpretation made it possible to keep the Old Testament, while changing its meaning. By questioning the inspiration of certain parts, they could reject whole sections that contradicted what they thought Christian scriptures should say. As one writer claimed, "It is therefore a most erroneous, though a very general idea... that every word, and every sentence, in the bible are either divine revelation, or written by divine inspiration...." Individual postmillennialists developed these theories to bring Christianity, science, and logic together. By playing down non-Christian aspects of the Old Testament, they brought it in line with their New Testament view of religion. The early LDS church similarly reinterpreted the Old Testament, through the retranslations and supplementary revelations, to validate their views. However, while both groups were trying to discover the truth in the scriptures, the LDS church did this by expanding their conception of scripture, and others did it by contracting and limiting their view to one aspect or interpretive strategy.

While Postmillenism was very much a popular movement, spread through revivals and benevolent societies, it was not the only movement facing questions of Christ, the Old Testament, and science. In the first half of the nineteenth century biblical criticism, as an academic pursuit using scientific techniques, took off in Germany. It extended to America as young scholars, like George Bancroft returned from studying there with the hope to "[raise] among us [in America] a degraded and neglected branch of study, which in itself is so noble, and to aid in establishing a thorough school of Theological Critics." Though American theological schools did not adhere all of the radical theories set forth by Schleiermacher and other German theologians, they did adopt many of their critical tools for studying the scriptures. These tools limited the amount they could project Christ onto the Old Testament, requiring them to redefine themselves as Christians in relationship with it.

Through careful application of reason and the scientific method, they hoped to obtain truth about the scriptures. Leonard Woods observed that when studying the bible, "the only mode of reasoning, which can be relied upon to lead us to right conclusions, is that which is pursued in the science of Physics. Regulating ourselves by the maxims of BACON & NEWTON, we inquire... 'What is fact?'" While it is difficult to imagine that everyone used physics to study the Old Testament, most agreed that "the same modes of criticism and explanation are to be applied to these Scriptures as to all other ancient writings," because "(Jesus) authorizes the exercise of reason in the case of revelation." This desire to understand what the scriptures say, and what they mean, was one of the crucial motivators in the Mormon's new interpretations. However, unlike the scholarly biblical critics, the Mormon's obtained divine reason through revelation in order to understand the Bible.

The American schools of biblical criticism, like the post-millennialists, focused most of their attentions on the New Testament. Like other scientists of their day, they saw humanity as a progression from savagery to civilization, and they saw religion as following the same pattern. They "[found] the same proofs of a wise providence, in the order and successive perfection of the different dispensations of religion, that we find in the natural growth and intellectual progress of individuals."31 Despite the outward similarity in belief to dispensational thought, biblical critics embraced scientific methods, not emotion or faith, to determine truth in scriptures.

Early Mormon scriptural thought, while outwardly very different from the schools of biblical criticism, did share some similarities. Both were particularly concerned with the text of the Old Testament. Mormons wanted a correct translation, to reveal its original meaning. And their new scriptures found Christ in the Old Testament, which is what the Biblical critics found so hard to do. Instead of reason and textual analysis, to cut through tradition, they found Christ in the Old Testament context through revelation.

The majority of biblical critics, while remaining Christian, were fairly negative to the Old Testament and the traditions that surrounded its interpretation. They believed that "...many of these errors belong to an earlier age than Christianity itself; and that their sources are to be found in the superstitions, and still more in the philosophy, which existed before our religion was preached to men."32 While this does partially refer to pagan traditions, one of the sources for error they refer to is the Old Testament and its interpretation. Christianity had long projected the scriptures onto themselves, interpreting them in ways that supported their beliefs. The Biblical critics were opposed to this, warning that in interpreting scripture "we are constantly in danger of extending to all times and places what was of temporary and local application."33 Without traditional interpretation strategies, they began to see how little Christ actually does appear in the Old Testament. Christ became less important in their interpretation of the Old Testament, because of this desire to read the text in the context it was created.

Early LDS converts were introduced to a view of the Old Testament world in which Christ's role was expanding, contrasting with prevailing trends. However, it is doubtful that they were shocked by the idea that Christ was in the Old Testament. Traditional interpretations and post-millennial conceptions attempted to discover those parts that were particularly Christian, and they consistently found Christ in the Old Testament because in seeking Him they projected Him onto scripture. What the Mormon scriptures claimed was that what these Protestants had seen in the Old Testament to support Christian belief was not just a projection onto it, but was really Christianity. While Mormons were not alone in their concerns over Christ's place in the Bible, they used different tools to understand it, revelation instead of reason. This allowed them to expand their conceptions of Christ in the Old Testament, counter to prevailing trends which limited Christ's presence to one aspect or one interpretive strategy.

Nature of Source: From a pre-millennialist periodical published between 1842 to April 1, 1844. Not clearly denominational, it presented excerpts from lectures by various clergy, as well as articles, sections of books, and letters to the editor. While there is mention, not condemnation of William Miller, the periodical does not adhere to his timeline. Though it does hold that the millennium, and Christ's return, is imminent. There is a tone of great urgency throughout all of the writings. Its focus is on personal preparation and study, rather than going out and converting others. The message is that the end is at hand, and that this is so obvious because of the evil of everyone else.

Comment: This article is divided into three parts, each published in a different month. The first section deals with the way that prophecy is fulfilled literally. It lists prophecies about Christ and their fulfillments in the scriptures. This sections conclusion is that, if that prophecy was fulfilled literally how can other unfulfilled prophecy be fulfilled any other way. The next section illustrates that there is still prophecy to be fulfilled. Using the Abrahamic Covent as an example of prophecy yet to be fulfilled. It takes an interesting slant on it though, in the next section, focusing on how Abraham will inherit it in his person, and spending a considerable amount of time defending against attackers of this premise. Apparently there were people maintaining that the inheritance was a "spiritual Canaan." One of the main focuses of the paper is that this prophecy will be fulfilled on this earth, literally. I was particularly interested by the author's discussion of how after Christ's arrival the inherited land will be renewed and so the inheritance will be a spiritual as well as a physical Canaan. Another interesting aspect is the way they tie themselves in as co-inheritors of this covenant through Christ. In the end of the last section there is a defense of pre-millennialism, and an attack against "progressivism."

Excerpt (pages): "...heaven will only receive Jesus only till the times of the restitution of all things (i.e. not the destruction, but the restoration of all things to their original order and primal perfection)" [pg3] "We believe...that Christ will actually, and personally, and visibly, be revealed from heaven, at the commencement of the Millennium (which we further believe to be very near at hand), to take possession of the promised land..." [pg3] "Christians in general receive Jesus, indeed, as a suffering and crucified Saviour; but, except in what is called a spiritual sense, they reject him in his character of a glorious King." [pg4] "...we perceive that God spake beforehand the very things, and no other, which He intended should be done; and that the minutest particulars detailed in them were fulfilled to the very letter. Now as we see this so plainly to be the case in every prophecy that has been fulfilled, what good and valid reason can be given why the prophecies...[which are in the future] should not be accomplished in precisely the same manner." [pg 6] "the question is not concerning the fact of the personal coming of our Lord—which no Christian doubts—but concerning the purpose and effect of it. Those who oppose the doctrine of the Personal Reign on Earth, imagine that Christ will come to destroy the present habitable globe, and to carry array his saints with him to some abode of blessedness in another part of the creation. We, on the contrary, maintain, that He will come to remain in it, to restore it, to establish it, to cause to inherit its desolate heritages, to sit upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom, and to order it with judgment and with justice forever.

With the purpose of establishing this latter view, we shall, in what follows, examine closely the promises made by God to Abraham, to give to him, and to his seed after him, the land of Canaan for an inheritance. If it can be proved that these promises are yet unfulfilled, there is but one conclusion to which a believer in the word of God can come; namely, that they shall yet receive, in every particular, a literal and exact fulfillment." [pg17]
"For I assert, on the authority if St. Paul (Gal. iii. 16) that (although the Israelites had certainly an interest in the promise) they were not the Seed to whom that promise was especially made. ...Christ was the Seed to whom the promise (of an inheritance) was especially made; and not either Isaac or Jacob (although in was also renewed to them personally), or to their descendants the Jews." [pgs20-21]

"...but what has this to do with us? How can it affect us, if they all should appear on earth again to receive it? I answer, "Much every way." The promise which is made to the seed, is made to us, if we are true believers in Christ Jesus. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us...that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith... 'if ye be Christ's; then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise"' [pg 38]

"...the minds of most turn with more complacency to a system which holds out the prospect of a gradual improvement of the world-of a gradual spread of religion by the instrumentality of human means-a gradual conversion of mankind to the knowledge and love of our Lord and Saviour, previous to his second coming..."[ pg 40] "...these expect...to work wonderful changes, and to bring on a kind of millennium of science and knowledge and intellectual refinement; which being varnished over with a sort of spurious Christianity, are to produce (as they think) the reign of universal happiness, peace, and glory." [pg 40]

"It is true, that for now nearly eighteen hundred years God has not shown himself in a visible form to mortal sight, or interfered in a visible manner in the concerns of men: but does this make it a thing too hard to be believed that the time may be coming when he shall again do so?" [pg 40]

Comment: This is a short article about biblical interpretation, addressing the issue of comparative importance. The author begins with explaining the argument about the validity of the bible as a whole, and asks if certain parts are of more or less importance or validity. After this, however, he mainly focuses on the importance of studying prophecy as opposed to any other portion. He promotes the relevance of prophecy to the present day, particularly in judging the nearness of the return of Christ.

Comment: This is an excerpt from a sermon given in England to the Church Missionary Society (presumably Church of England). It presents the pre-millennialist's view of missionary work, as a hopeless task. He isn't quite as definitive as some, but he does present the idea that only Christ's return can bring about the type of conversion sought. That the Christian's effort should be as a light in the darkness, but with the knowledge that only Christ can conquer the dark. One interesting aspect is his comments on gentile nations, and the impossibility of creating a holy nation. He remarks that the first holy nation will be the restored Jewish nation.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "I am aware, that there are those, who look for the universal establishment of the gospel in the earth, the promised enlargement and triumph of the church, in the later day, as the result of [missionary] efforts... By these they trust that the present, twilight of Christian principle will, gradually, and imperceptibly, increase into the brightness of that day of glory...I have no such expectations... The times of the Gentiles (Luke 21; 24) which are now fast running out, are times (as I conceive) in which God...is visiting the Gentiles, to take out of them a people unto his name." [pg 14] "Then shall be seen in the restored Jewish nation, the first example of a truly righteous nation..." [pg 14] "Thus, ten the triumph, the full establishment of his gospel in the earth, is reserved to Jesus himself." [pg 14]

Date of Publication: 1815

Library Location: BT 885 .B75

Nature of Source: This work is one of many such published yearly in America and England by clergy and laymen to discuss and debate various religious issues. Frequently these are sermons reprinted, print-ups of public debates, or written on a specific subject of interest which are published by request. They likely did not have a large circulation, but probably reflect ideas held by many. Their popularity probably had more to do with how well known the writer was, then how accepted the idea was by people. This particular author was popular enough to get his name mentioned in other contemporaries works. The author cites many other writers of this type, indicating that he was an avid reader of these kinds of publications.

Comment: This is a good example of the type of thing being published during the first quarter of the 19th century on this subject. It consolidates many of the main themes dealing with Christ, the bible, and the end of the world. These ideas are also seen quite strongly in early Mormonism, though expressed in different ways with different answers. The author feels that good things are yet in store for humanity, but is not clear what. He still reads a typological view of the Old Testament, but is starting to shift this into a prophecy oriented view of the bible. The idea that the gospel is one continuous stream, revealed to each prophet is one that is strong in Mormonism. In this book the author seems to be spanning the changing chasm of biblical interpretation. He sticks with typological ideas, focuses on millenarian passages, and maintains the validity of the gospel throughout biblical ages. How he maintains these contradicting views is through a prophetic typology, which focuses on the fulfillment and not the inferiority of the original.

Excerpt (pages): "References to the second coming of the Messiah, in almost every book of the Old Testament" "In contemplating the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, a careful observer will necessarily remark, not only on an uniformity or design, but also one continued well organized system of conduct, established from the beginning of the world, and predicted to continue to the end of it." [p. 1]

"Its great events, are signs and figures of things not seen as yet, and many of them are in force as such, at this hour. --Great things are still to be expected, of which we can form no conception, but as they are set before us in the figures of sacred history." [p. 2]

Abraham--"To him the plan of salvation by the mediator, was further opened, by showing in the Messiah, his humiliation or state of suffering, and his coming in glory. Thus Abraham saw his day," pg 6

"There are particular and express references to the Messiah, as well to his incarnation, sufferings, death and resurrection, as to his second coming in glory, in almost every book of the Old Testament." [p 7]

"God therefore has in great mercy left us on record, an account of his dealings with...his peculiar people...This was done for the advantage and improvement of the Christian church..."pg 75

"This has been a regular system from the beginning of time, to which all the prophets and apostles bear witness; and to which alone we are to look in considering the prophecies of the scriptures." [p 76]

"...the natural conclusion, that Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to day and forever, has been the great subject of all the revelations, made by God to his people from the beginning of the world" [p 143]

"to shut up a book and to seal it, is the same with concealing the sense of it...because there would be a long interval of time between the date of the prophecy and the final accomplishment--but the nearer that time approached, the more light should men have for understanding the prophecy itself. Comment: These are actually diagrams, which were placed at the beginning of the first volume of the periodical. There are two maps representing the holy land; one as it was divided in Joshua in the bible, and the other as it will be divided by the twelve tribes when they are restored to Israel. The diagram depicts the temple sanctuary which is to be reconstructed. The explanatory part is a key to the diagram, describing what each part is. These either were meant to stand alone, or were referred to in the edition prior to this one, which is not available on microfilm or any other medium. The January edition talks about the temple and the restoration of the Jews, but doesn't make reference to these maps. They do not include a lot of explanation, mostly just lists drawn from the scriptures.

Comment: This is an interesting article, which takes a rather different approach to pre-millennial missionary work than earlier articles had. It is actually an extract from "Anderson's Apology for Millenarian Doctrine," which I've seen cited elsewhere as being very popular. As the title indicates it appears to be an apologetic response to critics of pre-millennial beliefs. This excerpt is focused particularly on justifying and explaining their position on social work, like missions. It explains the general notion of their relation to this, then clarifies it and qualifies it. One particularly interesting point it makes is that while they do not believe that they can convert the world, and they condemn this view as not paying attention to prophecy, they believe that missionary work is part of the work that must come before Christ does. This missionary work will have limited success, but it will convert a chosen people out of all of the nations. They also mention missions to the Jews in this context. Of course they have to qualify their support in missions even further, and the author concludes in the excerpt with a section on the coming end of the world. So the over all feeling that this excerpt gives is that they believe in going on missions, but, at the same time, they think they are pointless.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "It is frequently charged against those who receive [premillennialism], that they must, on this account, not only become gloomy misanthropes, but that they must necessarily take delight in whatever of political, or physical, or moral evil, gives countenance to their views, and reflects credit on their wisdom." [pg 93] "...those who raise a warning voice of the wrath to come, may be actuated by the fear of God, an reverence for his word. As justly might be said, that Noah trembled at a sunny day, and hailed the passing cloud, lest his prediction should fail..." [pg 93] "What then is our duty as Christians? To lie down in apathy and helplessness, and because God will execute his purpose in his own time and way, to surrender our own efforts as presumptuous and useless? God forbid that we should inculcate such a doctrine: the blessing indeed is his, but the instrumentality is outs. We believe that those who expect the peaceful and progressive conversion of the world...not only labor under a delusion, but we put it to their serious consideration, whether they are not chargeable with a culpable inattention to the revelation they profess to follow..., with exalting the work of man above the word of God. The scriptures represent, not the conversion of the world before the coming of Christ, but its growth in apostasy and wickedness till ripe for the judgments of that time." [pg 93] "Having no promise that he will convert the nations by out agency, we pray for that which he has promised-his speedy coming and kingdom, and the salvation of all the ends of the earth in his own time...the calling of a people out of every nation, and people, and tongue, to swell the glories of his kingdom; and for this his work yet in progress, he has made us the honored instruments." Comment: This is a short article about God dwelling with mankind in a tabernacle, on this earth. It was particularly interesting to me because of the lack of differentiation I noted in them talking about Moses and Solomon and their speculation about themselves. The author looks at the accounts of Moses building a tabernacle, and Solomon a temple, and he sees himself doing the same thing with the same results. This article is trying to prove, through this, that it is possible for Christ, Jehovah, to live with man. Rather then using prophecies which say this will happen, events like it are related to show it already happened, and so can again. There is also an interesting notion that the events in the Old Testament are a mirror of what will happen at Christ's return. As the world was created in Genesis, it will be created again, as prophesied in Revelation, the last book of the bible.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "It has been well remarked, that 'the Bible is a history of Paradise lost, and of Paradise regained.' It begins with an account of the first creation, and ends with an account of the second creation." [pg 81] After this new creation "The tabernacle of God shall then be with men." "Let us examine particularly this expression and compare it with the same in other parts of the sacred scriptures, to determine, if possible, its meaning." "The first place in which we have any account of a tabernacle of God with men, is in Exodus XXV....If we would know what kind of dwelling this was, we may pass on to the 40th chapter..." [pg 81] "Moses here addressed the inhabitant of the cloud, and feared not to call him Lord, or Jehovah. Now can anyone deny, that the expression 'tabernacle of God,' and 'God dwelling with them,' under the Old Testament, meant a personal and visible manifestation and abode? If any further confirmation were wanting of this truth, we might pass on to the dedication of the temple of Solomon." [pg 82]

Nature of Source: From a pre-millennialist periodical published between 1842 to April 1, 1844. Not clearly denominational, it presented excerpts from lectures by various clergy, as well as articles, sections of books, and letters to the editor. While there is mention, not condemnation of William Miller, the periodical does not adhere to his timeline. Though it does hold that the millennium, and Christ's return, is imminent. There is a tone of great urgency throughout all of the writings. Its focus is on personal preparation and study, rather then going out and converting others. The message is that the end is at hand, and that this is so obvious because of the evil of everyone else.

Comment: This is a short article about the temple which is to be rebuilt in Jerusalem prior to Christ's return. It mentions many scriptures in the old testament referring to the temple and Christ's return. The article states that this new temple will be the sanctuary where Christ will live and reign in, when he returns in Glory. This temple will be the seat of power for the whole earth. The article is almost entirely scripture references, just tied together by subject.

Excerpt (pages): "A separate feature attendant upon the restoration of the Jews to the land of their fathers is, --that a temple shall be erected in Jerusalem, exceeding in Glory and splendor those which have preceded it." [pg 124] "Amos ix. 11," "compare Micah iv. 11"

Comment: This is a short article about the services to be performed in the temple which is to be rebuilt in Jerusalem prior to Christ's return. It mentions many scriptures in the old testament referring to the temple and Christ's return, as well as about sacrifices to be performed in the temple. The article talks about restoration of the temple rituals, as they were performed in the Old Testament, but makes it clear that this will be a new temple, much better then the older ones.

Nature of Source: This collection of pamphlets is one of many such published yearly in America and England by clergy and laymen to discuss and debate various religious issues. Frequently these are sermons reprinted, or print-ups of public debates, which are published by request. They likely did not have a large circulation, but probably reflect ideas held by many. Their popularity probably had more to do with how well known the writer was, then how accepted the idea was by people. This particular one was very popular, and was reprinted a number of times in England and in the United States. It is cited by contemporaries, in other sources, as a reputable source by a distinguished author.

Comment: This is a longer work, a combination of shorter pamphlets and sermons, republished together on request. It covers many topics, dealing primarily with the traditional typological interpretation. However, in one section entitled "Four lectures on the relation between the Old and New Testaments..." Jones details his view about the way the Gospel has always been on the earth, which is somewhat different from the view that the ancient Hebrews lived in darkness. He describes his purpose as "1st, to the Person of the Son of God, as it had been described in the OT. 2nd, to the Religion of the gospel, as being the same under both Testaments. 3rd, to the Church of Israel, as a figure of the church of Christ" [pg 239]

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "If a man hears the Bible all his life with a Jewish mind, he will know no more of it at last than the Jews do. The son of Adam will be left as ignorant as the son of Abraham, unless his heart and understanding are opened to admit the principles of the Christian Revelation" "But now with respect to us Christians, who see the glorious spirit of the NT under the letter of the old, ... Just such is the effect of the spirit of the Old Testament on those who are converted and look towards it, through faith in Jesus Christ, who is the spirit and glory of the law" [pg 205] "...there was a glory on the face of Moses underneath his veil, and there is a glorious spirit under the letter of his law." [pg 205-6] "The nature of man being the same now as from the beginning of the world, and the nature of God being unchangeable; it must follow, that the great object of the dispensations of God to man must be the same in every age." [pg 239] "...though he spoke in divers manners, as occasion might require at sundry times" pg 239 "...the apostle, speaking of those who were under the teaching of God in the wilderness, says unto us was the gospel preached as well as unto them; making the religion, delivered to us in the New Testament, but a repetition of what had always been delivered to the Church." Nature of Source: From a pre-millennialist periodical published between 1842 to April 1, 1844. Not clearly denominational, it presented excerpts from lectures by various clergy, as well as articles, sections of books, and letters to the editor. While there is mention, not condemnation of William Miller, the periodical does not adhere to his timeline. Though it does hold that the millennium, and Christ's return, is imminent. There is a tone of great urgency throughout all of the writings. Its focus is on personal preparation and study, rather than going out and converting others. The message is that the end is at hand, and that this is so obvious because of the evil of everyone else.

Comment: This is an odd article, because it is not really about priesthood in general, as it was practiced at the time. It is about a higher priesthood, Melchizedek's, and also about the nature of sacrifices and offerings. Since this publication depends on scriptural evidence they do not talk about the priesthood tradition, but trace evidence of the priesthood through the bible. They start with Melchizedek, discussing his role in accepting tithing. The author believes that this indicates a mediating role for priests, and that this indicates that man can not communicate directly with God. This idea of priests as an intermediary, being set aside to speak to God, is an old one. This article says that priests are special, because they must be half in God's world and half in this one. One interesting part about that is that they only mention Melchizedek and Christ as having this priesthood, though they talk extensively about offerings given by priests with this priesthood. The author posits that there were in the days of the Old Testament, and are today, two different types of offerings, thanks offerings, and sin-offerings.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "Without going into the details of the Aaronic order of the priesthood, this first and highest order seems to give the simple and radical idea of a priest, which appears to be, a mediator-one who serves as the medium of communication between God and his worshipers; who presents the offerings of the latter, and dispenses the blessings of the former."

"But a mediator presupposes some inability in the worshipers to approach God of themselves, and offer to Him immediately their tribute. We have no reason to suppose that the unfallen creature stood in need of a mediator, or that any thing prevented him from going directly to God; but since the Fall, man has needed a mediator in all his approaches to that great and holy Being with whom he has to do. There is enmity between man and his sovereign the justice of the latter demands that the penalty of transgression should be paid; the fears of the former make him shrink from coming in contact with One whom they represent as a powerful enemy: and there needs 'a daysman between them, that may lay his hands upon both.'

The mediator must either really, or by supposition and appointment, different from those for whom he mediates." [pg27]

"Such is the Great Mediator: 'God and man, in two distinct natures and one person, for ever.' All other priests were meant to represent him, and were solemnly set apart to this office by God's appointment: 'No man taketh this honour unto himself, but that he is called of God, as was Aaron.' Before the separation of the family of Aaron, the head of a family or tribe seems to have officiated in this capacity." [pg 28] "The nature of the various offerings mentioned in Scripture seems to have been twofold: they were either expiatory or Eucharistic." [pg 28] "...the following doctrine concerning Eucharistic and expiatory sacrifices and offerings may be fairly deduced:-Man had been commanded to render until the Lord a portion of the things of the earth which he possessed in token that God is the true possessor of the whole, that from Him they are received and at his pleasure they are held." [pg 29] "But the Fall placed the worshipers in different circumstances; it not only prevented him from approaching God without a mediator, but he was borne down with a weight of guilt...sacrifices were instituted; which are proper to man, not as a creature, but as a fallen creature." Comment: This short article follows the article about Christ's reign on Earth, and is similar in topic. It is basically attacking a certain point of view about the corporeal nature of Christ, and the sinfulness of matter. The author presents the other side as calling Christ degraded because of His physical condition, and that a physical body can aspire to no greater thing than a throne on Earth. Other opponents are cited as believing that Christ has shed the physical, and will reign in a spiritual world separate from this. The article deals a lot with the nature of physical matter, and asks if it is inherently corrupt. This is one of the most interesting parts, because these supposed opponents are not citing traditional original sin arguments to make this point. They are arguing that while the earth was created by God, the material out of which it was made was always in existence, so the corrupt aspect of the world was something in the material. The author concludes that the earth is not corrupt, because the earth is equally as much a creation of God as Heaven. He also states that there is nothing inherently sinful about physical bodies, because they were also made by God. This article contains interesting material about the nature of God and of physical matter. The primary point, however, is that Christ will be ruling with a physical body on a physical earth, and that this is no degradation to Him.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener
Excerpt (pages): "The scriptural doctrine of our Lord's glorious advent to set up his Millennial kingdom, is objected to by many under the idea that 'to suppose him reigning personally, and visibly in such a world as this, is rather to degrade than to exalt our Lord.'" [pg 7] "They think moreover, that the Lord would see with mortal eyes; forgetting, that in His view this earth is the dwelling-place of immortal spirits.--of his redeemed, of angels and archangels, 'ministering spirits sent forth to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation.'" [pg 8]

"But (they say) sin is here. True, it is so now; and that the Lord should on that account be nearer to us even now, as a present help, than these objectors really think, is a great condescension; but it is not degradation for the Lord con never be degraded by doing that which he has willed to do."[pg 8]

"They cannot keep in mind, that in the sight of the Lord all his works are equal, and there is nothing offensive but sin...these objectors, in the same way measuring every thing by their own carnal standard, believe that God dwells in heaven-meaning a place of His own making; but they cannot admit that he can dwell on earth, which is also a place of his own making. But why not? Because they think (and, if they knew their own thoughts, they would confess it) that the two places are made with different materials, and that the Creator did not make the materials. This alone can be their reason doe thinking that the earth possesses inherently qualities which must always, and under all circumstances, render it incapable of becoming either paradise or heaven. It is plain that these objectors do not think that the presence of the Lord constitutes heaven, or that sin is the cause of the present condition of this earth and its inhabitants." [pg8-9]

"Nor shall the earth always continue to exhibit on its surface those lamentable traces of the Fall, in sin and sorrow and misery, which alone give occasion to the idea of degradation we are combating. The prophecies all close in a promise of blessings showered down upon the earth; a restitution of all things; when "Satan shall be bound" (Rev. XX. 2)."

Comment: The author's approach to the Old Testament is typical for his time, and illustrates how the growing interest in millenerianism was combined with traditional typology. Mormonism has often been seen as distinctive in their "Christianization of the Old Testament," but this pamphlet makes clear that few Christians thought of any of the scriptures without thinking of Christ. What is different about the Mormon view of the Old Testament is that they really mean the whole gospel and not just Christ. Most Christians thought Christ was a part of the Old Testament, but this was through a combination of projection (through typology) and views of prophecies about Christ.

Thus Jesus Christ...who is God's way of showing mercy, was made known to Moses.--This shews his righteousness, that he may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." [pg 6]

Nature of Source: This book sets out to give answers to common objections to the Bible which Christians commonly face. It does not include the objections, just possible answers alphabetized by topic. The author was a medical doctor, from Ireland, who practiced in London before leaving for America. Theology and religion had always been of interest to him, but in his lectures in America he began to point out how the natural world showed that the scriptures were true. After these he was invited to debate the matter with gentlemen he called "infidels" in New York and Philadelphia. According to his report, he triumphed and was invited to write this book.
Comment: This is the section in the book particularly about the bible. Most of the book relates to the bible in some way, but this deals with it in particular. A lot of the stuff it says is very general, explaining what the bible is and what purpose it serves. What I think is particularly important is the way this author insists on the veracity of revelation, but maintains that not all prophecy is equal. Even more significant is his argument around the mistranslation of the bible. He talks about the unfortunate English translations.

Researcher: Sarah Wegener

Excerpt (pages): "consists essentially of, --1st. Historical facts...2d. Divine commands & divine communications: and 3d. Human commentaries which the writers as honest men, made, to the best of their judgment and opinion. It is therefore a most erroneous, though a very general idea...that every word, and every sentence, in the bible are either divine revelation, or written by divine inspiration." "No Christian could ever imagine that the Patriarchs, the Prophets or the Apostles were at all times under the influence of the Spirit of God." Author trying to persuade hearers to spread word.

Comment: Subtitle defines author's understanding of apostle. In passage "office" of apostle seems to be given to any believer who follows Jesus' commission to preach the gospel to all nations. The emphasis here is on the apostle as teacher, as conveyer of information, rather than as witness, which is given as a requirement in Acts 1 and as a definition in D&C 107:23. Nature of Source: These volumes were advertised for sale, in Palmyra's Wayne Sentinel, on April 6, 13, and 20, 1825. Michael Quinn uses this source to assert pre-1830 English-speaking awareness of chiasmus poetical structures and, further, to suggest a source for the structure of Book of Mormon chiasmus passages such as Alma 36. See Quinn, Early Mormonism, rev., 190-91, 500-501. Horne's discussion on poetry is informed by the work of Robert Lowth, the Bishop of London, whose Latin publications on Hebrew poetry first appeared in English in 1787 and were reprinted in 1816 (Horne, 447., n. 3). Excerpt below comes in chapter ten, volume two, entitled "On the Poetry of the Hebrews."

Comment: Quinn's idea is a real stretch. The examples of parallel poetry included in Horne don't bear a strong resemblance to Book of Mormon poetical structures, which are, besides, pervasive. Horne is also abstruse.

"Hieroglyphics are properly emblems or signs of divine, sacred, or supernatural things; by which they are distinguished from common symbols, which are signs of sensible and natural things.

Hermes Trismegistus is commonly esteemed the inventor of hieroglyphics; he first introduced them into the Heathen theology: from whence they have been transplanted into the Jewish and Christian....

Sacred things, says Hippocrates, should only be communicated to sacred persons. Hence it was, that the ancient Egyptian communicated to none but their kings and priests, and those who were to succeed to the priesthood and the crown, the secrets of nature, and the secrets of their morality and history; and this they did by a kind of cabbala, which, at the same time that it instructed them, only amused the rest of the people. Problems when he is called before "the counsel" at "south branch of Elder Farley's Church," where on May 11, 1808, he was excommunicated on three charges: 1) denying that the Savior is infinite; 2) denying the perfection of the Bible; 3) drawing up opposition articles to the church (10-11). Author justifies reasons for his apostasy in this tract.

Comment: Author attempts to show contradictions in effort to prove not every word of Bible true. Main example is discrepancy between the two genealogies of Jesus' ancestry
Joseph Smith, of course, was also concerned with Biblical errors and confusions but did not, judging from the excerpts in the present LDS edition of the Bible, attempt to correct the problems in these two passages. Author's "taking on the learned world" tone reminiscent of Joseph Smith in the King Follett Discourse when he presents new translation of Gen. 1:1. Date of Publication: 1808
Location: Shaw-Shoemaker #15860
Nature of Source: Starts off like visionary tract. Recounts early wickedness, misery, sees light and joins Communion Baptists, then finally yields to the call to preach (8). Problems when he is called before "the counsel" at "south branch of Elder Farley's Church," where on May 11, 1808, he was excommunicated on three charges: 1) denying that the Savior is infinite; 2) denying the perfection of the Bible; 3) drawing up opposition articles to the church (10-11). Author justifies reasons for his apostasy in this tract.
Comment: Author attempts to show contradictions in effort to prove not every word of Bible true. Very interesting argument for corruption of bible. More an argument against the monarchy than anything else. Joseph Smith's time frame for corruption much earlier than 1611 (see 1 Ne. 13:26). The "old Jew" who, according to Joseph Smith in the King Follett Discourse, corrupted Gen. 1:1, probably lived earlier still.

Excerpt (pages):
"I believe the bible was not printed at first from the volumes of parchment, or manuscripts, as they were written by the faithful men of God. The king knew if he suffered them printed, as clear as God had given the light, the people would know too much to be governed by monarchy, they would be of one mind, embracing the old republican principle, given by God, in the foundation, received by Jesus Christ and his apostles, and he, the king, with all his train of nobility must come to digging; so their wicked wits led them to interpret the bible, adding a little here, diminishing a littl there, misplacing, &c. that they have so interwoven the book, that nothing, short of the same spirit which spake by the holy prophets and Jesus Christ, can sever or select the truth in a chain. You will question, why did kings and priests do this? I answer, that they might keep the world in ignorance amusing them in hard labor, and they ride in splendor" (20)

Nature of Source: Author is a reverend and "vicar of Stockton-Upon-Tees." This 384-page work is a sequel to his A Dissertation on the prophecies that relate to the great period of 1260 years, completed in 1806. Author anti-catholic, pre-Millenial, a real decoder. Book of Daniel key for him. Lost ten tribes and Judah will be united as the "great Roman beast," the Catholic church, is being destroyed (vi). Author arranges work into thirty-four different prophecies from the Bible which he quotes and argues for. These prophecies function as chapter divisions.
Comment: First paragraph of excerpt below is first line of book. "House of Israel" for author apparently confined to lost ten tribes united with tribe of Judah. "Ephraim" no special role in the gathering, but seems to be among tribes lost. Gathering of Israel after scattering basic similarity with Mormonism, although word "gathering" not used here. Words "restoration" and "restored," however, are. Portion of Judah surviving to see Savior return is similar to D&C 133:35.

Excerpt (pages): "The restoration of Israel and the overthrow of Anti-christ are so closely connected together, that it will be found impossible to treat the one without likewise treating of the other.... I purpose to take a wider range [than his book 1260 years], and to collect into one point of view the various scattered predictions, which foretell that the whole house of Israel shall assuredly be restored, and that the power of Antichrist shall at the same period be broken for ever...."

[20] "... Judah is indeed restored: but the lost ten tribes of Israel are still dispersed through the extensive regions of the North and of the East. These, according to the sure word of prophecy, however they may be now concealed from mortal knowledge, will be found again, and will be brought back into the country of their fathers. All nations, and all tongues, shall come and see the glory of the Lord; for he will set among them a sign, even the sign of the Son of man, the sign of the illuminated Shechinah; and will send unto them those that have escaped from the slaughter of the Anti-christian confederacy, that they may declare his glory among the nations. Convinced by ocular demonstration that God doth indeed reign in Zion, and at once divinely impelled and enabled both to seek out from among them and to find the long-lost sheep of the house of Israel, they [21] will bring by land, in vast caravans, all the brethren of Judah for an offering unto the Lord, as the great maritime power had already brought the converted Jews for a present unto the Lord to his holy mountain. Then shall the stick of Joseph be united for ever with the stick of Judah: Ephraim shall be no more a separate people: but the whole house of Jacob shall become one nation under one king, even the mystic David, Jesus the Messiah." Nature of Source: Author the famous Methodist Episcopal Adam Clarke (1760?-1832). This source is 32-page pamphlet on text Acts 16:30, "What must I do to be saved?"

Comment: Like Paul, author believes Law of Moses fulfilled in Christ. Book of Mormon makes the idea ancient, giving people aware of the fulfillment in Christ. "They did look forward to the coming of Christ, considering that the law of Moses was a type of his coming" (Alma 25:16). Christ of course states his own relation to the law. (see 3 Ne. 9:17). So in Joseph Smith we see confirmation of a somewhat hollow assertion, in the form of a living, breathing narrative.

Nature of Source: Author the famous Methodist Episcopal Adam Clarke (1760?-1832). This source is 32-page pamphlet on text Acts 16:30, "What must I do to be saved?"

Comment: Author answering question, What did redemption do? Answer is twofold: 1) pardon for breach of law, 2) restore man to divine image. Book of Mormon agrees with (1), though it uses "forgiveness" instead of "pardon", and implies (2), as in the following passages: "have ye received God's image in your countenances" (Alma 5:14); God the Son will "take upon him the image of man, and it should be the image after which man was created in the beginning" (Mos. 7:27); after "God created man after his own image," man fell, Christ's "plan of redemption" brought back (Alma 22:12-13).

Author implies transgression in the garden made it impossible for man to fulfill law, as if he might have fulfilled the law before transgression. Fall thus unfortunate.
Book of Mormon, on the other hand, teaches that law could not have saved Adam or any other man. Fall therefore fortunate (see 2 Ne. 2:5, 22-23). In this sense Book of Mormon gives Pauline understanding of law of Moses an ancient date, even as ancient as the garden of Eden.

Excerpt (pages):

"The law given to man in his state of innocence was most probably this: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.' As he not only broke this law by his first transgression, but also lost the power to fulfill it; the object of God in his redemption, was not merely to provide pardon for the breach of this law, but to restore him to that Divine image which he had lost; hence the Gospel proclaims both pardon and purification: and they that believe are freely justified from all things, and have their hearts purified by faith. Thus the grand original law is once more written on their hearts by the finger of God; and they are restored both to the favour and to the image of their Maker." (32).

Concerning these things will I speak, and these things will I explain to you, my children: I who am Enoch. In consequence of that which has been shewn to me, from my heavenly vision and from the voice of the holy angels have I acquired knowledge; and from the tablet of heaven have I acquired understanding.

4. Enoch then began to speak from a book, and said; I have been born the seventh in the first week, while judgment and righteousness wait with patience. (92:3-4; p. 134)
In those days shall punishment go forth from the Lord of spirits; and the receptacles of water which are above the heavens shall be opened, and the fountains likewise, which are under the heavens and under the earth.

All the waters which are in the heavens and above them shall be mixed together.

The water which is above heaven shall be the agent;
And the water which is under the earth shall be the recipient: and all shall be destroyed which dwell upon earth, and who dwell under the extremities of heaven.

By these means shall they understand the iniquity which they have committed on earth; and by these means shall they perish.

Afterwards the Ancient of days repented, and said; In vain have I destroyed all the inhabitants of the earth.
And he sware by his great name, saying; Henceforwards I will not act thus towards all those who dwell upon earth.
But I will place a sign in the heavens; and it [57] shall be a faithful witness between me and them for ever, as long as the days of heaven and earth last upon earth.

Comment: Author thinks Enoch is a prophet because Enoch is able to prophesy Methuselah's name. Footnote says Methuselah means "He dieth, and water is sent forth" See Job 5:10. "And so it will intimate that Enoch, forseeing the deluge, gave his son this name; by which he proved himself a prophet, as well as a preacher of righteousness" (28 n*). Yet no indication that author believes Enoch can prophesy of Jesus Christ to come, or that he can prophesy the future because he has seen it, as with Joseph Smith's Enoch. The second paragraph below moves in the direction of Christianizing Enoch but eventually falls short.

No concept of divine commission. Author's Enoch is a righteous man whom God rewards with translation. Joseph Smith's Enoch is the leader of a community who God rewards with translation after the group has created a society that shuns wickedness. God's removing them seems to be an extension of what they have already done themselves.

Excerpt (pages):
"... Let us observe and acknowledge the goodness of God in translating Enoch. It was a reward for distinguished piety in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, and a strong proof of a future state and world; for none could think so good a man would perish: it is a proof of the happiness both of soul and body in another state; and (as a prophet) if he wrought no miracles, [30] this would be proof sufficient of his divine mission. This was one of the most instructive circumstances that could happe to the patriarchal age. Adam, who had such intercourse with God, was dead; Noah, who was to have those favours renewed, was not yet born; in the middle age, when men were growing corrupt, Enoch was taken to heaven; a circumstance that answers such noble ends, as were worthy of God to go out of the common way to accomplish.

"... Let us learn, like Enoch, to walk with God. This is the very essence of religion; it establishes a friendly intercourse between God and his creatures, especially in and through Jesus Christ. If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, then have we fellowship with him. He conversed with God in a friendly, grateful, and dutiful manner, and God with him. This is the most honourable, comfortable, and pleasant life we can live; and if this be our temper and conduct, we shall share in Enoch's happiness; and though we shall not be taken to heaven in so remarkable a way, yet his angels shall carry us to Abraham's bosom, and we shall dwell with God, both body and soul, for ever" (1:29-30)

"The Eastern people have preserved several very uncertain traditions, relating to Enoch, whom they call Edris. As, that Enoch received from God the gift of wisdom and knowledge in an eminent degree: that God sent him thirty volumes from heaven filled with secrets of the most mysterious sciences; for which reason the book of Enoch are so celebrated in the East though known only by their reputation. Besides these, he himself composed a good number, which are no more known than the former.
"They attribute to him the invention of the pen and the needle, or of writing and sewing; of astronomy and arithmetic, and particularly of geomancy.

"Moreover, it is said, that Edris, or Enoch, was the innocent cause, or occasion, of idolatry; one of his friends afflicted at his removal from earth, having at the instigation of the devil, formed a statue which represented him so naturally, that he conversed whole days with it, and paid particular honours to it, which gradually degenerated into superstition. Some day, Enoch had a son named Sabi, whom the Sabians of the East maintain was the author of their sect.

"The Heathen seem to have had some knowledge of Enoch, and of his prediction of the deluge. Stephens, the Geographer, calls him Anaues, and says, he lived in the city of Iconium in Phrygia. It had been foretold by some oracle, that the world should perish after the death of Anaes. He died at above 100 years of age, and the Phrygians shewed such sorrow on occasion of his death, that it became a proverb; and to lament Anaes, signifies a more than common mourning: Deucalion's deluge followed very soon. Eusebius, Praep. lib. ix. from Eupolemus tells us, that the Babylonians acknowledged Enoch as the first inventor of astrology; that he is the Atlas of the Greeks; that Methuselah was his son, and that he received all his uncommon knowledge by the ministry of an angel." "Enoch, in Biography, the son of Jared and father of Methuselah, was the seventh in lineal descent from Adam, and born in the year B. C. 3382. Eminently distinguished by his piety and virtue in a corrupt age, he was translated to heaven in the 365th year of his age, without undergoing the pains of dissolution. An apocryphal book, entitled "The Book or Prophecies of Enoch," has been ascribed to this celebrated antediluvian, and is cited, as some say, by Jude in his epistle, and more certainly by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and other ancient fathers. But this book was probably forged in the second century. The Mahometans mention Enoch under the appellation of Edriss, or Idriss, and record many fables concerning him, which it is needless to mention." [no page]
"... In its profane pretensions to be a revelation from God, in the inflation and pomposity of its style, the vanity of its allusions, the absurdity of its legends, and the grossness, and even obscenity, of some of its descriptions, the Book of Enoch cannot, perhaps, be paralleled by any pseudopigraphic [sic] composition which was ever palmed upon a credulous age. That there should be any advocates for the inspiration of such a work, must be truly distressing to every devotional mind; and that they should be found among the clergy of our Established Church, will be regretted by none more than the learned prelate whose work has undesignedly contributed to furnish arguments for a conclusion so full of danger and impiety....

[502] "But enough of Apocryphal figments. We bless God that 'we have a more sure word of prophecy, unto which we do well to take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in our hearts.'" (496, 501-3)

Date of Publication: 1812

Nature of Source: Author's name on last page, not title page. Unnamed editor of this four-page pamphlet says author "is a young woman of an excellent understanding, eminent for her piety, and is an Ornament to the Religion she professes." (4)

Author says didn't want to talk about vision, but her many friends and a "dying World" compel her on (1). The several visions recorded here are follow-ups to a conversion experience. First she feels justified by blood of Christ. Then two weeks later the "duration of Eternity" was "awakened in my view." Author describes heavenly armies bowed at entrance of gates of heaven. A week later she was with friends, fell into a trance for three hours ("as they told me") (2). During this time an angel took her to hell, where she saw dragon; then to heaven, where saw winged seraphim singing praises to God, and other angels going back and forth between heaven and earth. Excerpt below follows.

Author uses verbs "saw" and "beheld" throughout. Point of narration seems to be simply to tell the experience and through this to convince this dying world that heaven and hell are real. Repent or else.

Comment: Connects visionary culture with Enoch. This visionary "has desire" to see Enoch and Elijah. May tap into desires of early Mormon converts for Moses and Enoch material.

Excerpt (pages):

"In my view of DIVINE GLORY, I had a desire to enter, and join the HEAVENLY CHOIR, and asked why I might not. My Guide told me that I must return to the Earth, and declare to a dying World what I had seen. I had a desire to see GOD in HIS GLORY. My Guide told me that no flesh could see GOD and live. I saw GOD's Throne, and the GLORY that issued from it. I also saw the HEAVENLY HOSTS continually falling before the Throne, crying, Worthy, Worthy is the LORD GOD ALMIGHTY. I had a desire to see Enoch and Elijah, and a number of other Scripture Worthies, and was indulged so far as to see them. I saw that one Star differed from another in Glory, although every vessel was full. The end of the View. (3)

Nature of Source: Lays out lectures for first three degrees. Author a believer. Uses emdash frequently when content can't be shared. "Dedicated to all Free and Accepted recites to initiate. Maybe both. Does this Masonic account imply the eternity of matter?

Here God creates from chaotic matter, but the account does not say if the matter co-exists with God.

Comment: Excerpt comes from second section of second degree. This excerpt may be most useful in that it indexes a pre-1842 Masonic account of creation from a primary source. Well-traveled ground, of course. Compare similar accounts in Genesis, Abraham,

Excerpt (pages):

"Please explain the six periods.
"Before the Almighty was pleased to command this vast world from chaos to perfection, the elements and materials lay blended together without form or distinction:
darkness covered the face of the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. Then the great Jehovah, as an example to man, was pleased to be six days in commanding it from chaos to perfection. The first instance of His divine goodness and power was made manifest by his creating light, and calling it by a new name: the light He called day, and the darkness night. The second period was employed in laying the foundation of the earth, which he called firmament, which was to keep the waters that were above the clouds, and those beneath, asunder. The third period was employed in commanding those waters within due bounds, on the retreat of which, dry land appeared, which He called Earth, and the gathering together of the waters he called Sea. The earth being as yet uncultivated, God spake the word, and nature covered it with a beautiful carpet of green, designed as pasture for the brute creation, enriching it with shrubs, trees, flowers, and plants, in full growth and perfection. On the fourth period the Almighty was pleased to command those two grand bodies, the Sun and Moon; the Sun to rule the day, and the Moon the night: and was also pleased to bespangle the ethereal concave with a multiplicity of Stars, that Man, whom he intended to make, might thereon contemplate and adore Him as his great Creator. On the fifth period her created large whales and other fishes which the watery elements produced for the use of man: He likewise commanded the birds to fly in the air that man might delight both his eyes and ears with their beautiful plumage and melodious notes. On the sixth period the Almighty created the beast of the field and the reptiles which crawl on the earth: here we have an instance of his infinite goodness and power, by creating what effects he pleased without the help of natural causes, such as commanding light before he created the sun, and making the earth fruitful without the influence of heavenly bodies: he did not create the beasts of the field without providing sufficient herbage, neither did he make Man till he had furnished him with every thing fit for life and pleasure; then to dignify the works of his hands the more, He created Man, who came into the world with greater pomp than any of the beings which preceded him; for they came into the world with no other than a single command, but in the formation of Man, there was a consultation of the blessed Trinity: for God said, let Us make Man, which was done by forming him out of the dust of the earth: into his nostrils was breathed [21] the breath of life, and man became a living soul. This being the sixth period, the Almighty surveyed the works of his hands, which he saw was good, and to every being which he made, created he a mate, excepting Man, and in order that he might not be left destitute, He caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam, and from his said He took a rib, of which he made Woman. Thus having beautified and adorned the Creation, He rested on the seventh day from all his labour, blessed, hallowed, and sanctified the same, whereby he taught Man a useful lesson, to work six days industriously for himself and family, and on the seventh to praise and glorify God for every thing we so richly enjoy from His all bountiful Hands " (20-21).

Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Burlington, N. J.
Publisher: J. L. Powell
Date of Publication: 1836
Location: BV 4253 .B867, HBLL, BYU
Nature of Source: Printed sermon. Author is Bishop of Episcopal diocese of New Jersey. This sermon was given to clergy of the diocese of N.J. at the opening of the "annual convention" in Trinity Church, Newark, on May 25, 1836.

Comment: Episcopalians apparently unpersuaded by arguments against infant baptism swirling in recent past. Here is defense. Shows how far apart author and Mormon are. Both use phrase "little children." Both use word "law." But for author, gospel saves little children from law; for Mormon, Christ saves little children, who are all without law.

Author says every little child at birth an "heir" of sorrow and sin. Mormon says little children are "alive in Christ, even from the foundation of the world" and therefore have "curse of Adam taken from them" (Moro. 8:8).

With the starting grounds different, paths diverge from there. Author rhapsodizes over "how beautiful, how admirable" is infant baptism. Mormon insists those who believe it are "in the gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity." (Moro. 8:14). Note how both use God's unchangeability to support their argument.

Excerpt (pages): "The Church is faithful to her Lord in bringing 'little children' to him, in Infant Baptism. I assume that she has right to do so. I undertake no defence of the grounds and reasons of this sacrament. I enter into no argument to prove that the Gospel is more comprehensive, more benevolent, more regardful of human infirmity, than the Law. I can conceive of no necessity to show that He, who, before his crucifixion, said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God,' did not afterwards, when he had risen from the dead, exclude them from the initiatory rite of his religion, or forbid that they should 'be born of water and of the Spirit,' without which, he declared to Nicodemus, none can 'enter into the kingdom of God.' But, the authority conceded, how benign, how beautiful, how admirable for wisdom and benevolence, the uses of the ordinance! The infant sufferer is born into a world of sorrow and of sin, the heir at once of both. At the first threshold of his being, the Saviour's spouse comes out to meet him. She bears him to the bleeding Cross." (5)

Nature of Source: Text for the funeral sermon of Deacon Joseph Sexton, who died January 10, 1819. Author tries to answer the question, What makes a true Israelite?

Comment: Preoccupation with "true" Israelites also Joseph Smith's preoccupation, but author doesn't use the word "pure," doesn't believe blood has anything to do with it, and doesn't think of Israel as a lineage that can be discovered and into which outsiders can be adopted. Both author and Joseph Smith say works help define an Israelite. The true Israelite, affirms author, "is something more than a descendant from Abraham" (6). Author makes more of historical Israel than present. In the end, true Israelite discussion used simply as an analogy for life of deceased. Author stops short of saying deceased was a true Israelite or that hearers of the sermon can or should become such. Only examples of true Israelites author uses are blood Israelites in Bible who did good works.

Researcher: Jed L. Woodworth
Date: 6 July 1999
Excerpt (pages): "The true Israelite possesses a resemblance to the patriarch whose name he bears. Like him, he is strong in faith. Believing that God is possessed of a character infinitely perfect, and that he will do every thing in the best manner, he resigns himself and all his interests to his sovereignty. He rejoices in the promises of his word, and fully believes that not one title of all that he has spoken respecting the present or future world, his friends or his enemies, will fail of being accomplished" (11).

Nature of Source: Author "minister of the First Church in Dorchester" (1). Sermon published for the "Female Society of Boston and the vicinity for promoting christianity among the jews" (1). In final lines, author urges listeners to "pray that the vail may be removed from the hearts of the Jews; that they may acknowledge and receive their long expected Messiah; and enjoy, at length, the privileges of his gospel in their present influence and future blessedness" (15).

Comment: Author implies Jews deserved to suffer because of iniquity. Book of Mormon asserts Jews have been destroyed from one generation to next "according to their iniquities" (2 Ne. 25:9). Ancient promises still extended to Jews, however, as in Book of Mormon, although author does not extend "ancient covenant" across time as Book of Mormon does explicitly.

Excerpt (pages): "How we are shocked with their [the Jews'] vile ingratitude, their unaccountable obstinacy, their perverse rejection of the counsels of God against themselves!

"But let us not too rashly vent our indignation. Let us not smite whom God hath smitten. They have, indeed, deserved to suffer: and they have suffered much! [8] Still, however, they are God's ancient covenant people, and though they have most basely deserted him, he hath not wholly cast them off. Still he watches over them in all their wanderings; and still, we have reason to believe, has thoughts of peace concerning them. Still are they included in the wonderful plan of his dispensations, and interested in some of the most comforting promises of his word.--Their very preservation is an evidence of this, and appears to be with a view to the future accomplishment of prophecy in their restoration. Nature of Source: Buck called "the late Rev.," but I cannot determine which denomination he represents. Opposite title page are cuts of five reformers: Luther and Calvin are on top; Whitfield and Wesley are on bottom; Fox is in the center. Buck obviously not Catholic, as this and entry "keys" would suggest. Book has 615 pages. My conservative guess is about 3 entries per page, or over 1,800 entries total.
Comment: Narrow definition of keys. Besides, this dictionary contains no entries for Zion, Gathering, Israel (entry: "Israelites"), Priesthood (entry: "Priest"), all big ideas for Joseph Smith. Entry "Israelites" equates the word with Jews. First they were called Hebrews, then Israelites, then Jews, and the entry says to see the entry "Jews" for a "history of this people." (277)

"KEYS, power of the, the term made use of in reference to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, denoting the power of excommunicating and absolving. The Romanists say that the pope has the power of the keys, and can open and shut paradise as he pleases; grounding their opinion on that expression of Jesus Christ to Peter.... [Matt. 16:19] But every one must see that this is an absolute perversion of Scripture; for the keys of the kingdom of heaven most probably refer to the Gospel dispensation, and denote the power and authority of every faithful minister to preach the Gospel, administer the sacraments, and exercise government, that men may be admitted to or excluded from the church, as is proper." (288)

"CABBALISTS, certain doctors among the Jews, who pretend to derive from tradition an acromatic or secret science, called the Cabbala. This science is divided into three sorts. By the first kind, the Jews extract recondite meanings from the words of scripture. The second is a kind of magic, in employing the words and letters of scripture in certain combinations, which they suppose have power over the good and evil spirits of the invisible world familiar with them. The thir, which is properly the Cabbala, is an art, by which they profess to raise mysterious expositions of the scriptures upon the letters of the sentences, to which they apply them.
"The cabbalists suppose every letter, point, or accent of the law to contain some hidden mystery, which was revealed to Moses on Mount Sinai, but not written, (whence it is called the oral law,) but handed down by tradition among these mystic doctors."

Among their most celebrated professors they reckon Jacob Behmen, the mystic, Dr. Robert Fludd, an English physician, and many others of eccentric genius and learning, who blended the mysteries of alchymy, chemistry, and theology, into one system. The term Rosecrucian is of chemical derevation, from ros, dew, and crux, the cross; because they considered dew as the chief solvent of gold, and the cross as an emblem of lux, the light, those letters being all formed out of the figure of a cross. Excerpt (pages): "Mergo, to immerse, is the Latin word which answers to the Greek Baptizo; but when any thing is immersed in water, it is supposed to be washed, or cleansed; for this reason abluo, and lavo, whose primary meaning is to wash, are added to express that idea. But it is a great mistake to suppose, that all kinds of washing are expressed by this one term. Dyers in coloring cloth dip it in the dye, therefore tingere to color, is sometimes used to explain baptizein. But it would be folly from this to conclude; that a partial coloring of any thing not performed by dipping, is baptism. And we can, with no more propriety infer from the foregoing explanation, that any are baptized by sprinkling, than that we baptize when we throw off our clothes, or that Paul baptized when he shook off the viper from his hand." Title of Book: Strictures on the Consecration of Christ, and the Rite of Circumcision

Place of Publication: Norwich, CT
Author's concerns stated in following introductory passage: "Many authors, have lately undertaken to prove that the Baptism of Jesus, by John, was no pattern for believers in gospel times; but that it was done under the law as a legal ceremony, and was necessary only to consecrate him as a priest. The same authors generally contend for the divine right of infant sprinkling from the institution of circumcision. If these points can be supported from the scripture, it was greatly stop the growth of error, and settle the wavering minds of thousands."

Author concludes circumcision is not of God but of man, introduced into law later. Follows that infant baptism, if linked to circumcision, is not of God. Author's greatest objection to infant baptism, however, is lack of scriptural support.

Comment: Mormon says little children "cannot repent" (Moro. 8:19, 22). Same implied in discussion below. If children do not know "their right hand from their left," then they cannot willingly break law.

Nature of Source: No clue who author is, but this work has some universalist overtones, as it tries to reconcile plan of redemption with perfect equity and goodness of God. Author does not believe in original sin or innate depravity, but still believes people need redeeming, and that Jesus Christ does the work of redeeming.

Comment: Author has two arguments against original sin. 1) infants unprotected, and 2) best of humanity never good enough. Positive view of humanity. Takes first half of Matt.
5:48 seriously. Thinks man can become perfect in his limited sphere but no more, because man is incapable of "ever attaining to that which is absolute or infinite" (7).

"But this doctrine of original sin or innate depravity is not a solitary speculative error. Connected as it is, in the view of many, with our desert of eternal misery from the first moment of existence, and with the still further opinion, that there are infants not a few, who actually are excluded from the benefit of Christian redemption, it becomes a fearful doctrine indeed in its practical effects or application. It gives support also to the opinion that the best actions of the best of men, those not excepted which are wrought through the agency of the Holy Spirit, are tainted with sin; and that man must continue to live in sin through the whole term of his natural life [7] doctrines, which impugn the power and goodness of God, and the character of the blessed Redeemer, who 'was manifested to take away our sins;' and who taught, 'Be yet therefore perfect.'" "It will probably be inquired, if man be not born in a state of defilement, or actually polluted with sin, what has he to be redeemed from? To this inquiry it may be sufficient to answer, 'From the power of Satan unto God;' for it must be remembered, that, although he comes into the world in a state of negation as to evil, he is not clothed with that power over the outward creation, nor that divine splendour, which dignified
Adam, when he came out of the hands of his Creator. He is altogether helpless, exposed to temptation, and without the power of resisting it from any inherent strength of his own; much less possessed of the capacity to 'lay hold on eternal life.' Adds new material. At least 13 ministers from different denominations include articles, but Mormons are not one. Entry "Mormonites" (844) vitriolic.

Comment: Reveals attitudes of religious contemporaries towards some Mormon doctrines, particularly modern prophets and revelation. People who would believe Joseph Smith are called "a class of simple and credulous people." They must be must be really dumb because they allowed themselves to be "persuaded to dispose of their property." (This author is no Restorationist). Another problem seems to be Joseph Smith's claim to "revelation from heaven," which is supposed to be shut. Finally, author implies that many believers come from lower, impious classes outside of New England area. When Mormon literature does reach New England, author says, "not a few weak, and some pious people, are caught in the snare." (844)

Also interesting for its comments on Book of Mormon. Another case where a Christian feels he does not have the language in his own tradition to describe the relationship of the Book of Mormon to Bible. So he must go outside of Christianity, to Islam, to pick up the comparison. Islam, of course, is perceived as heathen, which is not an unacceptable category for Mormons. (At the end of the entry, the author deplores atrocities against Mormons as a "friend of humanity," not as a friend to all Christians).

Excerpt (pages):
"MORMONITES; believers in the 'Book of Mormon.' This famous book, which its misguided followers regard as a second Bible, or more properly as the Mohammedans do the Koran, is said to be a translation from certain brass plates, found by one Joseph Smith, in the town of Palmyra, (N.Y.) in 1826. They were inclosed in a box, which had to all appearance been used for common sized window glass. Smith pretended to interpret them, with a stone in his hat, and this hat over his face, while one Martin Harris was employed to write down the contents at his dictation. Some disagreement arising between the parties, Harris went away, and Oliver Cowdry came and wrote for Smith, while he interpreted as above described, till the 'Book of Mormon' was completed. Smith then gave out that it was a revelation from heaven, and that he himself was a prophet; and thus collected around him a class of simple and credulous people, whom he persuaded to dispose of their property, and follow him in the New Zion which he was commissioned to establish in Missouri, west of the Mississippi river, 'in the centre of the world.' They accordingly settled in Jackson county, in that state; and there under the guidance of the new prophet established a new society, from which they send out preachers in all directions to collect proselytes. A weekly periodical has also been established, through which new revelations are from time to time circulated among the community. Many of them find their way to New England, and not a few weak, and some pious people, are caught in the snare.

"The contents of the book of Mormon are a series of puerile eastern romance, with abundance of names, but no dates, localities, or connexion of any sort with sober history. Its style affects an imitation of Scripture, which, with the ignorant, gives it an air of sacredness, like that of a revelation from heaven. The above account of its origin is taken from a statement affirmed and subscribed to, before Charles Dimon, justice of the peace, March 29, 1834, by Mr. Isaac Hale, father-in-law of Joseph Smith, the pretended prophet. While in common with every friend of humanity we deeply deplore the outrages recently committed by some of the citizens of Missouri on the Mormon community, we deem it important that the facts should be known, which show the real foundation of the imposture.--See the Cross and Baptis Journal, 1834." These spiritual mates, dissolve, or disannual, all former marriage connexions; and many of them bed and board together, to the exclusion of all former vows. Such conduct as this, had not become general, and many would deny that such things existed among them, though proved by the most solemn declarations of persons of undoubted veracity."

[18] "Another young man, in presence of Judge Woodman, of Buxton, and myself, with several others, declared, that when he was admitted a [19] member of Cochran's fraternity, he had to hold a Bible in his hand, while Cochran administered a solemn oath, or what was called so. The amount of which, was, that if ever he divulged what took place in their private meetings, his name was to be blotted out of the book of life, and he suffer eternal damnation. He then pointed to, and named this young man's spiritual wife, and said he was willing they should lodge together, which they did, a number of nights, though he declared himself innocent of any sinful conduct. He testified, that Jacob Cochran lodged two nights, to his certain knowledge, while he was there, with a woman not his wife. Five couples more lodged in the same house, who were not husband and wife; one of which, had a wife at home at her father's house at the same time. He tarried at this house of ill-fame four nights, and came away innocent; took another young man with him and went back to Cochrane. They both asked for their dismission, which was granted" (7, 18-19)

Comment: Hard to say if author has in mind some actual belief of another demonination when he uses the phrase, "any other system of worlds." Could simply be covering theoretical bases. The phrase "an" angel would seem to go beyond the Book of Revelation's description of fallen angels. See Moses 1:37-39; D&C 29:36-37.

Nature of Source: Very dense 656-page treatise. Published for the Methodist Episcopal Church. Author says he writes for young ministers and divinity students in a style "neither Calvanistic on the one hand or Pelagian on the other" (4). First edition published in London? "London, March 26, 1823" follows preface.

Comment: Author attempts to prove the pre-existence in order to prove Trinity is divine. He thinks doing this will in turn prove Christ's divinity. Argument very exclusivistic. This logic might provide creative way to link Joseph Smith's doctrine of pre-existence with plurality to gods. Here could be another instance where Joseph Smith "democratizes" Bible passages normally reserved for Christ. The author of this excerpt seems unwilling to democratize (for if he did, his argument would be null). Author argues entirely from scripture. Uses John 1:15; 3:31; 6:62; 8:58, 17:5, etc. Joseph Smith, on the other hand, doesn't need to prove divinity of a being he has seen, so he becomes free to expand reading of same passages. He agrees with author of premortality of Christ, but broadens by giving premortal lift to Melchizedek priests (types of Christ) then later to entire church.

"The existence of our Lord prior to his incarnation might be forcibly argued from the declarations that he was 'sent into the world;' that 'he came in the flesh;' that 'he took part of flesh and blood;' that he was 'found in fashion as a man;' and other similar phrases. These are modes of speech which are used of no other person; which are never adopted to express the natural birth, and the commencement of the existence, or ordinary men; and which Socinianism, therefore, leaves without a reason, and without an explanation, when used of Christ. But the arguments drawn from these phrases are rendered wholly unnecessary, by the frequent occurrence of passages which explicitly declare his preexistence, and by which the ingenuity of unsubmissive criticism has been always foiled; the interpretation given, being too forced, and too unsupported, either by the common rules of criticism, or by the idioms of language, to produce the least impression upon any." Excerpt (pages): "[Gnosticism] derives its origin from the oriental philosophy. The hypothesis of a soul distinct from the body, which had pre-existed in an angelic state, and was (for some offence committed in that state) degraded and confined to the body as a punishment, had been the great doctrine of the eastern sages from time immemorial. Not being able to conceive how evil in so great an extent could be subservient to good, they supposed that good and evil had different origins. They looked upon matter as the source of all evil, and argued in this manner. There are many evils in this world, and men seem impelled to the practice of those things which reason condemns; but that eternal mind, from which all spirits derive their existence, must be inaccessible to all kinds of evil, being of a most perfect and beneficent nature. Therefore the origin of those evils with which the universe abounds, must be sought somewhere else than in the Deity. Now there is nothing without or foreign to the Deity but matter: therefore matter is the centre and source of all evil." (96)

Nature of Source: Author the famous Methodist Episcopal Adam Clarke (1760?-1832). This source is 32-page pamphlet on text Acts 16:30, "What must I do to be saved?"
Context of passage below shows that author believes "God" to be Jesus Christ.

Comment: Author gives justice and mercy priority among God's attributes. Alma too. Justice and mercy lock heads (Alma 42:13). Eventual resolution (Alma 42:24-25), as in below excerpt. Alma uses " robbery" or divesting metaphor to talk about resolution (Alma 42:25), while author uses embrace or investing metaphor. This latter usage similar to sixth verse of Eliza R. Snow's text "How Great the Wisdom and the Love," where mercy, love, and justice are said to "meet/in harmony divine" (see LDS Hymns #195)

"In the salvation of the human soul, two attributes of God appear to be peculiarly exercised, viz. His justice and His mercy; and to human view, these attributes appear to have very opposite claims; nevertheless, in the scheme of salvation laid down in the Gospel, these claims are harmonized so, that God can be just, and yet the 'justifier of him that believeth on Jesus.' In this scheme 'Mercy and Truth are met together; Righteousness and peace have kissed each other.'" (27)

Comment: This excerpt is the first paragraph of Webb's book, chapter one, falling under the title "Origin of Masonry, and its general Advantages." Important declaration of Masonic power. Here we learn Masonry is very old, even from the "commencement of the world"; that it is an "order"; that this order is the origin of all sciences and arts; and that knowledge in these fields languished in cultures where Masonry was apparently unknown or unappreciated. The text really wants to undergird all civilization with Masonry. Spirit of Christ in D&C 88 has similar rhetorical function, although absence of the Holy Ghost, not Spirit of Christ, seems to be the more likely candidate for culture not flourishing.
"From the commencement of the world, we may trace the foundation of masonry. Ever since symmetry began, and harmony displayed her charms, our order has had a being. During many ages, and in many different countries, it has flourished. No art, no science preceded it. In the dark periods of antiquity, when literature was in a low state, and the rude manners of our forefathers withheld from them that knowledge we now so amply share, masonry diffused its influence. This science unveiled, arts arose, civilization took place, and the progress of knowledge and philosophy gradually dispelled the gloom of ignorance and barbarism." (13)

(preface)

Comment: This excerpt concludes chapter one of Webb's book, under title "Origin of Masonry, and its general Advantages." The passage seeks to answer the question, What does masonry offer?

The answer, as summarized in the second paragraph, centers on friendship: masonry enhances the quality of relationships between males of differing background, culture, and temperament. This melding-into-friendship idea is also found in the School of the Prophets, a somewhat diverse fraternity (some of whom were Masons) whose salutation read in part: "in which covenant I receive you to fellowship, in a determination that is fixed, immovable, and unchangeable, to be your friend and brother through the grace of God..." (D&C 88:133).

While the advantages of masonry implicitly place friendship within the broader context of ancient Masonic covenants, the salutation of the School of the Prophets places friendship within the broader context of ancient gospel covenants: "in token or remembrance of the everlasting covenant," in the name of Christ (D&C 88:133).

The Nauvoo endowment subsumes the excerpted advantages of Masonry. Enhanced friendships, unified ethnicities, and mellowed temperaments were all functions of the Nauvoo endowment for Saints who poured into Nauvoo from various parts of America and Europe. But the endowment goes further by extending male-male to male-female and by giving covenants larger purposes and aims. Where the School of the Prophets seems limited in size, the Nauvoo endowment, like the Masonic order, has no conceivable limit to the number of initiates.

In a general way, the gospel itself subsumes these Masonic advantages. The final sentence illustrates: "In every nation a mason finds a friend, and in every climate a home." There is no doctrine of gathering here, as in Joseph Smith, but twentieth-century LDS would be at home replacing "Mormon" with "mason."

Excerpt (pages): "Masonry is a science confined to no particular country, but diffused over the whole terrestrial globe. Wherever arts flourish, there it flourishes too. Add to this, that by secret and inviolable signs, carefully preserved among the fraternity throughout the world, masonry becomes an universal language. Hence many advantages are gained: The distant Chinese, the wild Arab, and the American savage, will embrace a brother: Briton; and will know, that beside the common ties of humanity, there is still a stronger obligation to induce him to kind and friendly offices. The spirit of the fulminating priest will be tamed; and a moral brother, though of a different persuasion, engage his esteem. Thus, through the influence of masonry, which is reconcilable to the best policy, all those disputes which embitter life, and sour the tempers of men, are avoided: while the common good, the general design of the craft, is zealously pursued. [15]

"From this view of the system, its utility must be sufficiently obvious. The universal principles of the art unite men of the most opposite tenets, of the most distant countries, and of the most contradictory opinions, in one indissoluble bond of affection, so that in every nation a mason finds a friend, and in every climate of home." Nature of Source: Author's religion not stated. As can be seen in the subtitle, however, author arguing for depravity of man. Author wants total depravity, for in intro he says he fears that some people look at Adam's death as "only a lingering death of his body, and a partial obscurity of his moral faculty" (2). (See also last line of excerpt below) This excerpt introduces argument of pamphlet.

Comment: Author gives "that light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (John 1:9) the power to "distinguish between good and evil." Compare with Moro. 7:16, where "the Spirit of Christ is given to every man, that he may know good from evil." Author uses the "light" and "life" and "power" interchangeably; Mormon uses "Spirit" and "life" interchangeably (Moro. 7:16, 18). Author uses the term "natural generation" to describe how the "serpent" conveys depravity; Alma uses "nature" to describe the "devilish" effects of fall (Alma 42:10). Author seems to say that the seed of the woman (the good seed) remains dormant until the moment a person distinguishes between good and evil. Mormon and D&C 88, on the other hand, seem to imply that the light or Spirit of Christ is always present in a person. Total depravity of man a difference here.

Excerpt (pages): "Let us suppose that death and total depravity was the result of transgression. What then? Why, except the same power that breathed into him life and light, should interpose, man must cease to be. If we suppose Adam died not, but had only his moral faculties partly obscured, how shall we account for the immediate opening of his natural eyes--and his moral eye, to see he had done wrong? Let us suppose that the quickening spirit of the second Adam interposed to restore life and light, and consequent enmity between the seed of the serpent and seed of the woman, the very moment Adam died. What then? If so this enmity between these two opposite kinds of seeds, must then, be in Adam; and these unmixable seeds or principles, would each strive against each other.--But how came the seed of the serpent in Adam? Because he yielded to the temptation? How came the seed of the woman in him? Because the Son of man out of his mere good pleasure and love to men, sowed it in him. How is the seed of the serpent communicated to men? By natural generation. How is the seed of the woman communicated? In the same invisible way it was communicated to Adam. "Howbeit that was not first which was spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual." The seed of the woman in Adam, being that light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world; by which Adam had the knowledge of good and evil; and as soon as we see children begin to distinguish between good and evil, then we see the effects of this divine seed, or talent, which I fear some people call the remains of the divine light in Adam in Paradise, or natural light: which supposes Adam not to have been totally depraved by the fall, nor mankind in him."

Comment: First paragraph of excerpt is the first paragraph of a declaration of good will, read to and then assented by the candidate of Masonry. The second paragraph of excerpt is a statement of the acceptance after the candidate has given his declaration of good will. Both paragraphs use the phrase "mysteries of masonry."

The phrase "mysteries of masonry" may place the phrase "mysteries of [esoteric knowledge]" in the vocabulary of Hyrum Smith, Heber C. Kimball, George Adams and other long-time Masons who later converted to Mormonism. Years before Joseph Smith revealed the Fullness of the Priesthood in Nauvoo, phrases similar in structure to "mysteries of masonry" appear in the revelations. These phrases juxtapose religious vocabulary with "masonry." Examples include "mysteries of God" (D&C 6:7 and 11:7;1829); "mysteries of godliness" (D&C 19:10;1830); and "mysteries of my kingdom" (D&C 63:23;1831). This juxtaposition may push back Joseph Smith's involvement with Masonry to pre-Nauvoo. For early male converts to Mormonism who were also Masons, this juxtaposition may have provided form in which to more easily assimilate the purpose and content of the early revelations.

Comment: This story was told to the candidates of the Degree of Knights of the Ninth Arch, or Royal Arch, as part of the "history and charge" of that degree. (245) The story is buried towards the end of this three hundred-page book, and does not seem to be of major importance in Masonic ritual. It is not likely that most Masons new the story.

But the story poses an interesting question: What were the boundaries of a "prophet" to Masons who later converted to Mormonism? Here we have a broad, expansive definition in the form of a narrative of the prophet Enoch. Some themes resonating with Mormonism include the following: 1) Enoch is called in vision 2) God appears in the vision 3) God promises to reveal His name through Enoch at some future time 4) Enoch transported to high mountain to receive divine teaching 5) Enoch shown plates of gold on which were written characters never to be pronounced 6) Enoch doesn't receive plates he is shown, but instead makes his own after proving himself by building a temple 7) Enoch insures a pure translation by copying to his own plates the same message he has seen on God's plates 8) Enoch deposits his plates in the earth for safekeeping 9) Enoch wants to preserve God's knowledge from the wicked but at the same time make it accessible to the righteous, so he engraves "hieroglyphics" on a marble pillar, marking the spot where he buried the plate of gold. Presumably only Enoch the prophet or his emissaries can interpret what the hieroglyphics mean--the knowledge is off-limits to the wicked and must be interpreted for the righteous.

Notice also how young and vigorous this prophet is: building temples, fashioning plates, inscribing into metal and marble, depositing records deep in the earth, constructing pillars, and so on. The hand is always important here, and this prophet does not speak so much as he builds. Though he is aggressive, he is no renegade, recording only the "imitation" of the message he has seen. For Masons who were early Mormon converts, all of this could have been part of their conception of who or what a prophet was.

In Webb's text, the story seems to function as a sort of justification for masonry. The hieroglyphics written on the marble pillar contain the Masonic secrets, which in turn guard the sacred gold plate buried deep in the ground.

Brodie's No Man Knows My History (1945/71) uses the story to explain where Joseph Smith lifted imagery for his story of Book of Mormon origins (66, n*). She says the Enoch figure was adopted from the Cabbalistic literature, but does not say whether the story itself came from that literature.

"Enoch, the son of Jared, was the sixth son in descent from Adam, and lived in the fear and love of his maker; God appeared to him in a vision, and thus deigned to speak to him: As thou art desirous to know my name, attend, and it shall be revealed unto thee. Upon this, a mountain seemed to rise to the heavens, and Enoch was transferred to the top thereof, where he beheld a triangular plate of gold, most brilliantly enlightened, and upon which [246] were some characters which he received a strict injunction never to pronounce.--Presently he seemed to be lowered perpendicularly into the bowels of the earth, through nine arches; in the ninth, or deepest of which, he saw the same brilliant plate which was shewn to him in the mountain.

"Enoch, being inspired by the Most High, and in commemoration of this wonderful vision, built a temple under ground, in the same spot where it was shewn to him....

"Enoch, in imitation of what he had seen, caused a triangular plate of gold to be made, each side of which was a cubit long; he enriched it with the most precious stones, and encrusted the plate upon a stone of Agate, of the same form. He then engraved upon it the same ineffable characters which God had shewn to him, and placed it on a triangular pedestal of white marble, which he deposited in the ninth, or deepest arch...."

"....Enoch perceiving that the knowledge of the arts was likely to be lost in the general destruction, and being desirous of preserving the principles of the sciences, for the posterity of those whom God should be pleased to spare, he built two great pillars on the top of the highest mountain, the one of brass, to withstand water, the other of marble, to withstand fire; and he engraved on the marble pillar, hieroglyphics, signifying that there was a most precious treasure concealed in the arches under ground, which he had dedicated to God. Article originally written as article for Theological Review of the Christian Disciple. Published here with changes.

Comment: Authors accept pre-Nicean view of God. They are very interested in recovering the original teaching, and they insist Christ did not teach the Trinitarianism. Their first reason for disbelieving the doctrine of Trinity is in fact "because we can trace its history, and show its origin, in a very different source from Christian revelation" (31). This source, of course, turns out to be Platonism. Authors think it makes better sense of scriptures and early Church fathers to view Christ "as a being distinct from GOD, and intermediate between Him and his creatures" (57). Just what the authors mean by "person" hard to get handle on, however.

"We wish, however, first to observe, that the ancient doctrine of the Trinity, as it existed before the council of Nice (A. D. 325) was VERY DIFFERENT from the modern, and has this great advantage over the latter, that when viewed in connexion with the unity of God, it is not essentially incredible. The orthodox doctrine, previous to the period just mentioned, taught that the Father alone was the Supreme God; and that [5] the Son and Spirit were distinct beings, deriving their existence from him, and far inferior; each of whom, however, or at least the former, might, in a certain sense, be called God." "Now as it is difficult to determine whether the spirits that appear are good or evil, or both; the only conclusion upon that point, is to be made from the errand they come about, and I think it is a very just conclusion; for if a spirit or apparation comes to, or haunts us only to terrify or affright, to fill the mind with horror, and the house with disorder, we cannot reasonably suppose that to be a good spirit; and, on the other hand, if it comes to direct to any good or to forwarn and preserve from any approaching evil, it cannot then be reasonably supposed to be an evil spirit.

[6] ..."Secret notices are daily given us of capital dangers attending, and yet how do the most vigilant observers of those signals, and the most eminent omen-hunters, even after those notices, fit still, and grow indolent? or else, amaz'd and bewilder'd, they say, I know there's something a coming to me [7], some mischief attends me, I have plain notice of it, but I don't know what it is, I can't tell what to do, I can do nothing to avoid or prevent it. Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: London
Publisher: D. Steel
Date of Publication: 1770
Location: 823.51 Es73s 1707 Rare 4040, HBLL, BYU
Nature of Source: No author listed for this, the 6th and final printing of this evidently popular work. First edition 1729, London. All printings London. Author of first printing Andrew Moreton, pseud. for Daniel DeFoe (1661?-1731), author of Robinson Crusoe. All reprintings after his death. Book first published as The Secrets of the Invisible World Disclos'd: Sacred and Prophane, Under All Denominations; Whether Angelical, Diabolical, or Human-souls Departed. (See National Union Catalog for Pre-1956 Imprints, 136:645)

A puzzle whether author really believes what he is writing. Why a pseudonym? "Also the notions of the heathens concerning apparations. Being the most Entertaining, and in Quantity, the Cheapest Book of the Kind," reads the last lines of subtitle (titlepage). Title of chapter three (of fifteen) in this 1770 printing: "Of the appearance of departed unembodied souls." Excerpt comes from this chapter.

Comment: Second half of excerpt intimates a doctrine of premortal life. The word "mass of soul," however, may connect author's reading to eastern and not western religion. Author somewhat skeptical of premortal life idea. Broaches it only in this statement and then in chapter dwells entirely on unembodied spirits who once lived in flesh. Spirit and body distinct. No concept of spirit as a kind of body.

Excerpt (pages):
"It is a material difficulty here, and ought to be consider'd with the utmost plainness, viz. what we mean by unembodied souls; whether we understand souls which have been encas'd in flesh, but being unhous'd, are now moving about, in what state we know not, and are to be spoken of as in their seperate capacity; or whether there is any such thing as a mass of soul, as a learned but pretty much incompitent writer calls it, which waits to be embodied, as the superior disposer of that affair may think proper to direct." Title of Book: The Masonic Museum; Or, Free-Masons' Companion
Title of Article:
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: New York
Publisher: J. Hardcastle
Date of Publication: 1816
Location: Shaw-Shoemaker # 37794
Nature of Source: Subtitle says "A Collection of Songs, Chorus, Odes, &c. Adapted to the use of Chapters and Lodges" (title page). Author compiles this volume in "a sincere desire to be a useful labourer in the vineyard of Masonry" (3). Title of song for chorus excerpted below is "The Pipe of Tobacco" (68).

Comment: Anti-tobacco. See D&C 89:8. Ecclesiastes-sounding argument, some of it illogical. We are told, for example, that smoke indicates vanity, and that tobacco is "gone with a puff," and yet this ignores incense as metaphor in the Old Testament for prayers rising up to God. Wants to say tobacco is a problem because it is of the earth and subject to decay. But if this is so, where is Solomon's temple and Masonic lodges of centuries past?

Excerpt (pages):

"Tobacco is an Indian weed
Grown green in the morn, cut down at eve,
Show's our decay, that we're all made of clay;
Think on this when you're smoking tobacco.
The pipe that is so lily white
In which so many take delight
Is broke with a touch: Man's life is such.
Think on this when you're smoking tobacco.
The pipe that is so foul within Show's how man's soul is stain'd with sin,
It doth require, to be purg'd with fire,
Think on this when you're smoking tobacco.
The smoke that doth ascend so high Shows that we are but vanity
'Tis all earthly stuff, and is gone with a puff
Think on this when You're smoking tobacco
The ashes that are left behind
Should serve to put us all in mind
That we all come from dust, and return we must,
Think on this when you're smoking tobacco. (68)

On this part of the subject candour demands that I should mention what is said in behalf of the use of Tobacco, by the most eminent of the modern Physicians. The editors of the last edition of the Edinburgh Dispensatory observe, that 'Of late, Tobacco, under the form of a vinous or watery infusion, given in small quantities, so as to produce little effect by its action on the stomach, has been found a very useful and powerful diuretic. Dr. Fowler has published several cases of Dropsy and Dysury, in which its employment has been attended with the best effects: and this has been confirmed by the practice of others. Beaten into a mash, with vinegar or brandy, it has sometimes proved servicable for removing hard tumours of the Hypochondres. Two cases of cure by this means are published in the Edinburgh Essays. Injections by the anus of the smoke or decoration have been of advantage in cases of obstinate Constipation, threatening Ileus, of incarcerated Hernia, of spasmodic Asthma, and of persons apparently dead from drowning or other sudden causes. If any of the Tobacco-consumers choose to make use of it... in any of the above cases, they have my full consent. But let them observe, that none of these medical gentleman recommend the constant use of the pipe, the snuff-box, or the quid; in behalf of which, those who use them plead so warmly.' (12)

Nature of Source: Author the famous Methodist Episcopal Adam Clarke (1760?-1832). Small 24-page treatis. Traces history of Nicotiana in the English culture. Title would indicates two-sided argument, but this tract is decidedly anti-tobacco. (Only exceptions I cite in another .) Author quotes medical authorities to make his main points, summarized in the six conclusions excerpted below.

Comment: That the treatis is written at all shows tobacco was then under debate. Floor of School of the Prophets = floor of Methodist church. Tobacco juice is a problem; Emma Smith is not alone. The argument against tobacco here mainly a common sense argument, whereas argument for several uses of tobacco [see other ] relies entirely on medical authorities. Science helps make point #1 below, but in the end author doesn't need science to make his case, going beyond tobacco proper for what he thinks is his strongest argument against it. Tobacco, he says, leads to the greater evil of drunkenness. In contrast to the author's elaborate explanation, D&C 89:8 says simply: tobacco "is not good for man."

Excerpt (pages):
   "To the great scandal of religious people, the abominable customs of Snuff-taking and chewing have made their way into many congregations; and are likely to be produtive of immense evil. Churches and chapels are most scandalously abused by the Tobacco-chewers who frequent them; and kneeling before the Supreme Being, which is so becoming and necessary when sinners approach their Maker in prayer, is rendered in many seats impracticable, because of the large quantity of Tobacco saliva, which is ejected in all directions.

   [21] ..."To those who are not yet incorporated with the fashionable company of Tobacco-consumers, I would say, never enter. To those who are entered, I would say, desist. First: For the sake of youth health, which must be materially injured, if not destroyed, by it. Secondly: For the sake of your property, which, if you [22] are a poor man, must be considerably impaired by it.... Thirdly: For the sake of your time, a large portion of which is irreparably lost, particularly in smoking. Have you any time to dispose of--to murder? Is there no need of prayer--reading--study? Fourthly: For the sake of your friends, who cannot fail to be pained in your company, for the reasons before assigned. Fifthly: For the sake of your memory, that it may be vigorous and retentive; and for the sake of your judgment, that it may be clear and correct to the end. Lastly: For the sake of your soul.--Do you not think that God will visit you for your loss of time, waste of money, and needless self-indulgence? Have you not seen that the use of Tobacco leads to drunkenness? Do you not know that habitual smokers have the drinking vessel often at hand, and frequently apply to it?.... May God look upon, and save you before it is too late!" (20-22)

Zion as the "only proper object of joy" (below) is also given in outline in Moses 7:18 ff and in numerous passages in the Doctrine and Covenants. Of course Old Testament passages, particularly in the book of Psalms, would also carry the same meaning.

We do not understand by its being said that Zion, or the Church of God, is the joy of the whole earth; that all the world do actually rejoice in this object; but we are taught that Mount Zion is the proper, and the only proper object of the joy of the whole earth." (8)

Title of Book: Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge: or Dictionary of the Bible, Theology, Religious Biography, all Religions, Ecclesiastical History, and Missions
Title of Article: "Sion"
Title of Periodical:
Place of Publication: Boston
Publisher: Shattuck
Date of Publication: 1835
Nature of Source: As large as one volume can get. 1275 pp. Aims to take best from Calmet's and Brown's Dictionaries of the Bible; Buck's Theological Dictionary; Abbott's Scripture Natural History; Wells' Geography of the Bible; and Jones' Biographical Dictionary, and others. Adds new material. At least 13 ministers from different denominations include articles, but Mormons are not one. Entry "Mormonites" (844) vitriolic.

Comment: This work shows awareness of Joseph Smith's new language but shows no respect for that language. Under entry "Mormonites," Joseph Smith is said to have persuaded believers to "follow him to the New Zion which he was commissioned to establish in Missouri, west of the Mississippi river, 'in the centre of the world.'" (844). Yet entry "Sion" in this dictionary incorporates only single, traditional meaning of Zion, that of mountain. (Under entry "Zion," reader is told to "See SION." [1184]). "Sion" as mountain entry, a portion of which is excerpted below, comprises two short paragraphs.
