Poems by Colleen Whitley*

The Dying Leaves

The leaves looked safely dead upon the tree,
Their veins collapsed as those of crucified
Men, or animals, hung up and dried.
Yet when the wind at last shook them free,
I saw a moist and spreading drop still
Flowing from each freshly broken edge.
I watched the leaves, but when I tried to catch
The falling fragments to see if life still
Flowed from them as from their parent, they rattled
Brown-paper edges against grass stiffened
By frost, and shivered as they skipped beyond
My reach. In starting leaps, they scuttled
To the warmth through the open kitchen door,
Where I found them dead on the polished floor.

Apple Trees in Winter

The skeletons of summer stand In regimented rows, Feeling twigs and summer sprouts Frozen where they used to grow.

^{*}To give our readers a broader view of the poetry of one poet, we have printed seven poems on various themes by Colleen Whitley in this issue. Mrs. Whitley, who has an English M.A. from Brigham Young University, now teaches in Ames, Iowa.

Arthur

I sat in mist like this once as a child. Sir Ector had told me that if a wild sea bird ever tried to reach the dome of heaven, he'd crack against it, tumble back, leaving bloody feathers on the angels' wings and holes in the clouds. He'd ruffle sea-blown mist and where he struck the earth, no moss could grow, for dream-drawn birds who tried to fly too far would catch their wings in clouds and soon would find their feathers dampened and their eyes made blind. I sat by gannet banks along the coast and waited on moss-clothed rocks for almost half a day. I watched the watchless ocean play lick-tag with the cliffs and rolled the clay beneath the moss-rocks into balls and threw them at the cliff-devouring sea who gobbled them. But then the evening mist seeped in from rocks and sea and sky and slipped about the rookeries and over me. And so I went back home. I could not see the birds along the banks or in the sky; I couldn't see them leave or land and I was cold and wet and no more quite convinced where Heaven was, or what. I've wondered since whether either men or birds should ever try to set such sun-soaked goals and fly so high.

POEMS 275

Merlin

I was a wise old man willow whistles But now giddy Guenivere's replaced the rhymes and his brain. He used to tried to tell him, but like chanting charms to while he does, his thoughts I could, and I would If he would hear, I whole Table will spiral staircase peasants and the villeins and hamlets will being burned in a witches and the from lowly classes the rabble, in the for the priests and But he won't listen. I've told him all that I can Table and the tactics and ruling. I need a miss me, probably. Not comes to claim crown and he'll know. I tried before he saw Bellicent, he would go see that I warned him now, he There's no sense in my stay and still I would he would only come when he whittled watched will-o-the-wisps. grown more important and runes I settled in listen while I telling him now is children. He'll listen, but dance off with her. warn him about her. would warn him that the tumble down her someday and the from the villages come to see a queen bone-fire like the warlocks who come causing trouble in restless landless rabble for the barons. I've stayed here long enough. tell about the the trickery of rest. Besides, he'll never me, not till Modred kingdom, and then to tell him that time, too, before the babies, but wilful witch. And if likely wouldn't listen. staying—still I could stay to warn him, if and ask me to.

The Genealogist

I hear them calling me beyond the years, beyond the graves, beyond the books and records beyond the seeming inexhaustible expanse of lives.

Their voices come beyond the half-plowed fields, and calling birds and wrinkled newspapers and papers never read and ironed clothes and clothes untouched by soap and wagon ruts and ruts rubbed smooth.

Through all the thousand things of their experience and mine,

They call unerringly.

To Robert Welch

Sing a song of suspects, Pockets full of spies, Look at all the pinkos Right before our eyes.

When the files are opened, See them all appear. Haven't we such dainty things To whisper in your ear?